MR. JOHN REDMOND said he did not know whether they would be recalcitrant or not, but the same difficulty would arise when the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education came to issue his mandamus. If the Bill passed in its present shape it would enable the local authorities to trample upon the great principle which had been laid down by the House. It would fan into life the fires of religious strife in every part of the country at every election, and at every local election in Great Britain. The question of the granting or the withholding of these facilities would be debated and agitated on every platform. And if the Bill was intended to be a settlement of the religious difficulty—as he believed the Government intended it to be—nothing could be more unfortunately enacted by Parliament than to make this a test question at every little election throughout the country. He took the strongest view on this question. He thought the settlement of the educational problem by the present proposals of the Government was mad and wicked, and from the point of view of this great Parliament cowardly—in this sense, that instead of the Government deciding for themselves and for the House whom they represented what was just and then enacting it and carrying it out, they were leaving it to be carried out by the decision of the local authorities, more or less irresponsible—at any rate to local authorities who were elected from time to time for other purposes. He came now to the right hon. Gentleman's alternative. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that if "shall" was left in the Bill there would be very great difficulty in enforcing the law. His hon. friend who interrupted him wanted to know how the law was to be enforced. The right hon. Gentleman proposed as an alternative an appeal to the Board of Education, and that the Board of Education should step in and do what would be done without its intervention if "shall" was put in the Bill. What he wanted to say was this, that if the limits of 5,000 and four-fifths were made satisfactory, if there was some provision for giving effect to the voices of the parents in the selection of the teachers, he, for one, would be quite content to accept the Bill, and that "may" should remain in the Bill instead of "shall." With regard to schools contracting themselves out of the Act, he entirely disapproved of it. The talk about contracting out was a mockery in this connection. What was the meaning of contracting out? It meant that parties voluntarily contracted themselves out of the Act. That was not what was proposed in the Bill. It meant that the Education Board might, whether the school owners liked it or not, kick them out of the Act. Contracting out, as the Government proposed it, meant the semi-starvation of these schools. He did not agree with the Minister for Education in his view that these would be rare cases. He thought himself that the temptation to save money on the rates would be so great to the local authorities—and in this he agreed with the hon. Member for North Camberwell, who would be accepted as an authority, if he himself was not, in those matters—that many local authorities who, if this proposal were not in the Bill, might perhaps grant facilities, would refuse the facilities and precipitate an appeal to the Board of Education in the hope that the appeal would result in the contracting out of the school. He believed it would after a while become the usual course with the Board of Education. It would save them infinite trouble and unknown risks, and he believed in almost every case of appeal the result would be that the school would be put outside the operation of the Act. That would be a fatal thing for the schools in whose name he spoke. It was true that there might be in some parts of England a few rich Catholic schools, bodies sufficiently endowed to be able to carry on their work if they were cut off with nothing but the Imperial grant; but taking the Catholic schools generally, he asserted that contracting out of this character—that was, taking away the rates and leaving them only the Imperial grant—would mean inefficient schools, badly paid teachers, and half starved schools, and he asked hon. Members as educationists if they were prepared to advocate such a scheme as that. It was the interest of every man in the House to take steps for the efficient education of all the children of England. It was their interest to see that the Catholic children were as highly educated as the children of any other class. It would be a fatal thing if the House adopted as a settlement of this question a scheme whereby these schools would be condemned to that state of semi-starvation in which unfortunately a good many of them were before 1902.

MR. WALLACE (Perth): Would the hon. Member object to the contracting out clause if the grants given were sufficient for the purpose of carrying on the schools?

MR. JOHN REDMOND said that was an entirely different proposition from any that had been made, and he certainly would be very slow indeed to say he would reject any such settlement. All that he and his friends wanted was this. They wanted on the one hand that there should be sufficient provision for these schools to enable them to be efficient and on the other hand they wanted a provision which would enable them to have religious teaching in their schools as satisfactory to them as the Protestant religious teaching was to the children in the Protestant schools. If a proposal such as the hon. and learned Gentleman had mentioned were put forward he admitted it would not be open to many of the objections he had been urging to the present proposal. They were not afraid in the schools of their people being induced to ask for facilities when they did not want them. On the question of rent he would not dwell, because he believed when the question came to be carefully thought out it would be borne in on the mind of hon. Gentlemen opposite that it was a shabby and mean proposal, and that its effect would be to hit that very class of school to whom the money was of most importance—that was, the schools of the very poorest of the poor. With regard to contracting out, one of the great cries of the Nonconformists in this controversy, in the country at any rate, had been the objection, the natural objection, which they entertained to pay money for the teaching of a religion with which they did not agree. He was informed by those who were in authority and knew the facts that if the rates and taxes paid for educational purposes by the Catholics of Great Britain were pooled to-morrow they would provide a fund sufficient to maintain all the Catholic schools in the country. For how many years did the Catholics go on paying for the schools of England in which they had no share, while providing their own schools—paying school taxes for the maintenance of the Board schools? And they raised no objection. Now the Government were proposing to revive that system and to say to these poor Catholic schools, "You must maintain your own schools, you must pay for your own Catholic teaching, and in addition to that you must pay rates for the teaching of Protestantism in Protestant schools." He submitted to the Committee that that was not a fair proposal, that it was not one which would commend itself to the judgment of hon. Members. To speak of such a result as that being in the nature of a settlement of the religious question seemed to him to be an absurdity. He did not believe that such a scheme would ever pass into law, and if it did pass into law it would be the opening of a new chapter of sectarian hatred and differences in England. If this proposal was carried the inevitable result would be that before long they would find religion of all kinds driven out of all the schools. That solution commended itself to many men in the House, but he did not believe it commended itself to the majority in the House or in the country. There were only two possible solutions. One was the secular solution; the other was allowing the creeds to have their own religion to themselves in the schools. If by this Bill they destroyed the second alternative he was convinced they would have religion of all kinds driven from the schools. Surely there must be some way out of the difficulty. There was no inherent cause of hostility between English Nonconformists and Irish Catholics, and surely it was not beyond the possibility of statesmanship to devise some plan whereby the Catholics might be able, without interference with the great national system of education, a system suitable to the wants and conformable to the interests and wishes and convictions of a great Protestant country, to continue (and that was all they asked) to teach their own religion to their own children in their own schools built by the hard-earned money of their people.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) said that although he could not claim the indulgence of the Committee as a new Member, he could do so upon this question, as this was the first time that he had ventured to enter upon this great theological controversy. Personally he agreed with what had fallen from the front Opposition Bench and from the last speaker. He believed that secular education, or alternatively non-denominationalism, were the only true solutions of the difficulty. He regarded the measure, and he was sure his hon. friends on that side of the House would agree with him, as an honest attempt at compromise upon a most difficult subject. What had amazed him, therefore, throughout these prolonged debates had been the tone of the criticism, not only on the Opposition but on the Ministerial side of the House with regard to it. That criticism entirely ignored the fundamental principle of the Bill, viz., that it was brought forward to satisfy the three great faiths existing in this country, viz., the Nonconformist, the Anglican, and the Catholic. He was sure that the Leader of the Nationalist Party must recognise that this Bill was as liberal a concession to the interests of the Catholic schools in this country as could be expected from a Protestant nation. It said that Roman Catholics should have separate teaching of their doctrines by separate teachers. [Cries of "May."] Well, he entirely agreed with the argument which had been advanced that "may" in this case was better than "shall." For all practical purposes they were conceding to the Catholics of England as large and as liberal measure of religious teaching as could possibly be expected at the hands of a Protestant Government. If his hon. friend would cast his eye over to the United States, that great country of religious freedom, he would find no concession was given.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said there was no religious teaching there.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES said that was hardly correct; there was Bible teaching, sometimes combined with definite religious teaching. It was true that the 5,000 and the four-fifths were both arbitrary figures, but at the same time common sense told them that that was the only way to deal with the situation. He would like to see distinct and definite treatment meted out to the Roman Catholics, because he recognised that with the Roman Catholics it was a question not only of the teaching to be given, but of the teacher who was to give it, and that being so he regretted the want of courage of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education in not conceding to the Roman Catholics distinct and definite treatment. So far as his own faith was concerned, he ventured to say that apart from ecclesiastical laymen of the Anglican Church, and apart from an eclectic body of ecclesiastics, the great body of the Anglican laity were and would be content with a simple system of Bible teaching. He had spoken to hundreds of laymen on the subject, and the almost universal reply to his question was that the great body of the Church of England would be content with simple Bible teaching in the schools. But naturally the Church of England had a grievance. It was objectionable in many ways that the rural schools should be left out, that 100 per cent. of the children in the rural schools should not be able to obtain definite religious instruction, whilst 80 per cent. of the children in the urban schools could obtain it. But the Bill was a compromise, and if these facilities were given to the rural schools the Nonconformists would immediately have a grievance. He admitted the grievance of the Nonconformists, and he submitted to the Minister for Education that the system which obtained in France might very well be adopted in this country. In France one day a week was given to definite religious instruction, and that system had, so far as he had been able to ascertain, worked most satisfactorily and harmoniously. But he ventured to suggest to his brethren in the Church that in this matter there was no other way of dealing with the question. He regretted that 100 per cent. of the children in rural schools could not get any definite religion, but everyone would admit that there must be a modus vivendi. The Nonconformists had given way in this matter; they also were parties to the compromise, and he was not sure that they had not given just as much as the Roman Catholics. It was with them a matter of conscience that they should not pay anything towards a State religion in education or in any other way. But they were now willing to waive that, and all they asked for in return was that in those areas where there was no alternative school they might have education unfettered by any religious teaching with which they were not in accord, and which was contrary to the fundamental principles of their faith.

MR. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): Does Dr. Clifford accept Clause 4 ?

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES said whether Dr. Clifford accepted Clause 4 or not had, in his view, very little to do with the matter. But those Nonconformists who sat in this House were, he believed, quite content to accept it. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed, but surely no one would suggest that Clause 4 would be a permanent or final solution of this great religious controversy. No one would suggest that this controversy could be settled by one Act. The clause was but a step in that direction, but he regarded it as a very great step. He thought there was a great deal of false dialectical force imported into the discussion of whether "may" or "shall" should be incorporated in the clause. If they put in the word "shall" they exposed the local authorities to the risk of being shot at by the Anglicans upon the ground that there was sufficient school accommodation for the Nonconformists, and they exposed them to the same risk at the hands of Nonconformists on the ground that there was not sufficient accommodation. Whereas if they put in the word "may" they did not expose them to that risk. He could not imagine anything worse for the discharge of their duty by the local authorities than that they should be exposed to litigation which might not be very effective, but which, if it were not, would harass and hamper local authorities. But with the word "may" that could not be. If the word "may" was inserted, it would go a long way to discourage attempts upon the part of small bodies of Anglicans to disturb the arrangement which had worked very well hitherto. He did not know whether he had made it quite clear, but what he wished to convey was that if when four-fifths of the parents demanded it, the local authority was compelled to give special facilities, obviously the Anglican section would strive their utmost to whip up sufficient numbers to compel the local authority to give the facilities; but if the words were "may grant" and they were doubtful whether the local authorities would grant the facilities, they would not be so anxious to whip up the parents. The proposal of the Government was an honest attempt to meet the difficulty, and if it was worked in the spirit in which local authorities usually endeavoured to carry out the public duties which devolved upon them, he did not think those who were so anxious to maintain voluntary schools would have any reason to complain of this measure.

*MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said he had listened to every speech on this Amendment from the Ministerial Benches, and from the beginning of the discussion to the present moment not a single argument had been brought forward against it, except the allegation of the Minister for Education that there was some technical difficulty in applying for a mandamus. In the course of his professional career he had had considerable experience in regard to the process of mandamus against local authorities and others, and he would like the Minister for Education or the Under-Secretary to be good enough to explain a little more clearly to those whose professional duty it was to try to understand the rules which regulated the granting of a mandamus, how it was that the Government could not adopt this Amendment and which particular difficulty was alleged to be so formidable. He had taken the trouble to cut out the eulogy which the right hon. Gentleman passed last night upon mandamus as a means of coercing local authorities. He said—

> "Assuming that the Board supported the appellants and thought it was reasonable that the school should be taken over on the terms of extended facilities being given, it was more unlikely that any local authority would refuse to be guided by the Board of Education. If, however, they still held out, there was a mandamus. He confessed he would not allow himself to contemplate the possibility of a local education authority anywhere refusing to obey an order of the King's Bench. Was there any county in England or Wales where the King's writs did not run? Certainly not. Therefore the mandamus was a most powerful engine whereby to effect the purpose they had in view."

He challenged any lawyer to explain one single respect in which the principles that would regulate the granting or witholding of a mandamus differed in the circumstances contemplated by the Minister for Education from those involved in the Amendment of his hon. friend.

Mr. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): The late Colonial Secretary said mandamus would be perfectly useless because there were many Nonconformists and others who were still ready to go to prison.

*Mr. F. E. SMITH said he was not thinking of the infinite discussion as to whether there were in this country Nonconformists who would not obey a mandamus, and Heaven forbid that he should embark upon that discussion. The point was a purely technical one as to whether the right hon. Gentleman was right when he came down to the House and said he could not accept this Amendment, not because it was not just, or because it would not meet a grievance which was admitted by the hon. Member for North West Durham to be genuine, but because of some supposed technical difficulty in granting this mandamus or in making it effective when granted.

*The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Lough, Islington, W.): His right hon. friend desires mandamus to be the last resort.

Mr. F. E. SMITH said the Parliamentary Secretary's admirers, of whom he was one regretted that he did not do himself more justice in these interventions. Did the hon. Member imagine he desired it as a first resort? If the local education authority would do what the Government meant it to do, there would be no necessity for mandamus. If on the other hand the local authority would not exercise those powers which had been placed in their hands either to exercise or refuse, then they would take the mandamus as the last remedy. Surely the time had come when these pitiful evasions and contradictions should be abandoned? On Clause 4 they could not expect to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education on this point had received nothing but insults from those outside the House and from those hon. Members of his own Party who sat below the gangway. He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side had read some of the statements made at a very striking meeting of Radicals which met to consider Clause 4. This was what was said by the right hon. Gentleman's own friends. Dr. Clifford said that Clause 4 was fatal to a final settlement. Such was the effect produced by the Bill upon those who had most assiduously laboured upon the platform in the interests of the Government. Dr. Leach said the Amendments made the clause worse. The Rev. Hurst Hollowell said that—

> "The Amendments touched the depth of folly, and the clause staggered under the accumulations of its own absurdity."

He went on to say—

> "Reconsider the whole position. Produce a better Bill. The clause is an outrage."

That would appeal to the Parliamentary Secretary. Lord Stanley of Alderley was certainly not a biassed or hostile critic; but he said that—

> "the Government Amendments had been flung at the Paper without any consideration at all, and justice could not be done in the limited time to this immense new problem that was presented."

They sympathised with the Minister for Education in being exposed to these very injurious observations, because it involved the pathetic inference that there was no reward even for drinking the cup of humiliation to its dregs. Surely the time had come when the right hon. Gentleman should cast aside for a moment the rôle of Issachar so far as this Bill was concerned. They were all agreed as to the objects they wanted to secure. They wanted to see that the schools should continue in the future as to-day. The Minister for Education had told them that it was his desire that these schools should go on in the future as they had done in the past. He supposed they were all agreed about that. [Cries of "No."] He thought that was the one point upon which they agreed with the Minister for Education, who told the Jewish deputation that he desired to see their schools go on in the future as in the past. Therefore, it was immaterial what hon. Members below the gangway wanted because they were not the Government. They did not intend to vote against the Government and they were therefore negligible. Apparently they could not speak for themselves, so that the Minister must be assumed to speak for them. The right hon. Gentleman desired equally with themselves to see denominational teaching preserved in the schools. If he was honest, he desired equally with themselves to see a denominational atmosphere preserved by the agency of tests for teachers. The right hon. Gentleman desired to see all these things; therefore it was for the Committee to consider whether they would be best secured by the plain simple Amendment of his hon. friend, or by the illogical labyrinth of Amendments which they did not understand, and which had been put forward as an alternative proposal. He wished to make one more observation. He knew as far as religious subjects were concerned some of them who represented Liverpool seats were considered to hold remarkable views. He expressed no opinion on any side of the religion question which had convulsed Liverpool opinion so long and bitterly, but he would say that any proposal which would make it necessary for candidates to state at municipal elections whether they would vote for special facilities to Roman Catholics or Protestants was calamitous and reactionary. He entreated the Government to accept the Amendment. It was one which would improve the Bill; but on the other hand, if they refused it, while it might not only shatter the Bill, but have the more serious effect of shattering the Government, still they might say of the right hon. Gentleman Impavidum ferient ruinæ.

*MR. ADKINS (Lancashire, Middleton) said that they had just heard a speech decorated with many irrelevant epithets, and he did not intend to follow the hon. Member in so grave a controversy by such methods—methods which were more proper to a debating society than to the House of Commons. He would only suggest that during his next evening of leisure the hon. Gentleman should devote himself to a still wider research into ecclesiastical rhetoric, and he would find gems among the utterances of members of his own Party equal to any of those he had given to the country. There were not a few Members who desired to approach this great political question in a somewhat humbler spirit, and with some regard for practical difficulties. He wished to take that opportunity of thanking the Government for the alterations they had made with regard to Clause 4. He believed most thoroughly that they were improvements, and that taken altogether they did advance a very considerable step towards that solution which he trusted all Members desired, although, of course, it was difficult in such a question to approach the matter from all points of view. There was a certain reason for retaining "may" as against "shall," entirely independent of those considerations which had taken up most of the time of the Committee, The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover had arranged with great skill the methods of restriction which were provided in the clause, and made the rhetorical point, of why should there not be one final restriction which should turn "may" into "shall." It was obvious that all those restrictions already placed in the clause—restrictions with regard to the number of parents asking, with regard to the ballot—which in passing he might say was absolutely essential if this was to be a true exponent of real local feeling—all those restrictions were of a general kind which might properly apply to all parts of the country. But besides those matters there were in many districts, and there might in every district arise, considerations in which the discretion of the local authority might be perfectly well exercised, without any of those evil designs which had been attributed to local authorities with such extraordinary freedom during the debate. He would give an illustration. They might very well have in a town of some size—he could very well imagine it happening in many parts of Lancashire—four or five voluntary schools, which applied for the "special facilities" under Clause 4. If it were made mandatory every one of those schools would be obliged to have them, irrespective of what was educationally best for the district. It might very well happen that it was better to give them to three schools—those which were susceptible of enlargement—than to give them to all five schools, and so incidentally perpetuate some small and inconvenient schools. And they who were supporting the Government in retaining the word "may," were really thinking much more of those practical definite difficulties than of designs against the consciences of their fellow citizens, with which they appeared to be credited. He desired also to say a word on another point. It was proposed in the Government's Amendments not as a first resort, nor as a second resort, but ultimately to give to the Board of Education a certain power which had been caricatured under the name of "contracting out." He would like to point out to the Committee that the phrase "contracting out" with all its associations was a most improper phrase to apply to this particular suggestion. He said this with diffidence, remembering what the hon. Member for North Camberwell said yesterday. He was one of those Members who on nearly every educational occasion followed his hon. friend with affectionate docility, but in this particular he seemed to have passed from his usual keen criticism of the Bill from an educational point of view and had launched his transpontine thunders against the Government, because forsooth they had put something in the Bill which recalled to him a previous fight on different issues. What was the objection to contracting out? The objection to contracting out, when that phrase was used accurately, was an objection to allowing considerable parts of the country to get outside a national system. But the defence for the proposal of the Government was shortly this, that it could not conceivably occur in or be applied to large parts of the country. It could not come about owing to the wanton wishes of misguided people in a particular district. It could only come about by the deliberate action of the Board of Education in a most difficult crisis, and if there was any institution in this country opposed to contracting out and to the evils of contracting out by its traditions and everything regarding it, it was the Board of Education. The Board of Education, with the natural desire of a great department to have proper control over national education, was the very last body of persons who would be drawn towards the evils of contracting out. But might he point this out. They had heard that day with the greatest candour and force from the hon. and learned Member for Waterford the statement —he would not say of the extreme, but of the full position of his co-religionists. Where they had a demand made—not for facilities, for that could be granted under the terms of the Bill, but for something far more than facilities, for what was practically the choice of the teacher, that, whether it was right or wrong, was per se inconsistent with a uniform national system. And supposing they had—Heaven grant that it might not happen often!—a particular locality and a particular denominational school, each taking the most vigorous and extreme view of what they considered their rights, then when all other resources were exhausted, he believed and he thought the Government believed, also, that the best and only ultimate safety valve was the suggestion which had been made by the Amendment to the clause. It was no more fair to label that with the name of "contracting out" and to attribute to it all the disasters and all the evils which contracting out had led to in the past, than it was to describe a safety valve as something which destroyed the motive power of an engine. The analogy was entirely forced and wrong. Therefore, in supporting most heartily as he did these Amendments of the Government, he included not only one but all of them. He would vote for "may" rather than "shall," because with the appeal to the Board of Education he was convinced that denominationalists were secured against wanton spite, whilst at the same the proper discretion was left to the localities which they must have if they were to do their duty. He would vote for it all the more readily, because of the care and skill in detail which the Government had devoted to dealing with the method of appeal and the action of the Board of Education, and he would also vote unhesitatingly—in spite of showers of telegrams and irrelevant phrase-making in all directions—for the further clause giving power to the Board of Education in the rarest cases to arrange for a State-aided school, because he believed that that safety valve was the only means by which they could extend as far as possible the national system to which, for the sake of education, far more than for anything else, they were whole-heartedly pledged.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that Clause 4, and in a minor degree, Clauses 5 and 6, were really the only clauses with which he and his friends were seriously concerned. He knew some misunderstanding existed on the subject, but he wished hon. Members opposite would dismiss from their minds the idea that Catholic schools which did not get relief under Clause 4 could have recourse to Clause 3. He did not believe that any Catholic schools would avail themselves of Clause 3, or that Clause 3 really covered their case, and therefore unless they were relieved from the provisions of Clause 1 under this clause they would be completely shut out from all benefit under the educational system. All their hope of being able to accept this Bill as a tolerable settlement for the Catholic people had been all along based on the expectation that Clause 4 would be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the conscientious convictions and difficulties of their people—and also into harmony with the declarations of the Minister for Education himself and other members of the Government. What were those Amendments to which they had looked forward? They looked to obtain by those Amendments (1) some security that their schools would really be admitted under the clause, (2) for some modification of the restrictions, which as the clause now stood, cut out nearly exactly half of their schools from all benefit under the clause, and (3) for some security that teachers would not be forced upon their schools with the deliberate object of turning this clause into a mockery. A most remarkable speech was delivered in the course of yesterday's debate by the hon. Member for the Morley Division of Yorkshire, who was, he thought, recognised by Nonconformists opposite as one of the leaders of the extreme Nonconformist Party. The hon. Gentleman said—

> "He had always been in favour of leaving religious education in the hands of the churches and taking it out of the hands of the State. But if it were brought home to Nonconformists that Cowper-Temple teaching was opposed to the religion of Catholics and Anglicans he believed that the bulk of Nonconformists would agree with him that the only possible solution of the question was secular education. He admitted that some means would have to be taken to secure where denominational teaching was given that the teachers were friends of the denomination."

That was a very generous and remarkable statement from the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member who had just spoken said that the hon. and learned Member for Waterford claimed that Catholics should have the appointment of all teachers in Catholic schools which obtained special facilities. That was not what the hon. Member for Waterford said. What his hon. friend asked for was that the parents of the children attending a denominational school, which ex hypothesi under these restrictions must be a homogeneous school composed of children of one religion only, should have some assurance of the bona-fides of the Government and of the House that they were not going to force conditions upon the Catholic schools with the deliberate object of turning the whole of the clause into a mockery. He welcomed the fact that the hon. Member for the Morley Division agreed with that, for he said that some means should be taken to secure that where denominational teaching was given the teachers should belong to the denomination. That was all they asked for in regard to that provision. That was absolutely essential, because if it were open to anybody to object to the operation of Clause 4 and to avail themselves under this provision of the right to appoint the teacher it would have the effect of turning the whole thing into a mockery, as a teacher might be appointed who would be unable to give denominational teaching. If the right hon. Gentleman was sincere in wishing to carry out the clause, he ought to make this small concession, not to give the appointment of the teachers, but something which would carry with it an indication that the House meant that the local authority should loyally carry out the intentions of the section. As to the second Amendment with regard to facilities, it was beyond all question that under the 5,000 limit 240 of the Catholic schools would go, and that under subsection (b) with respect to the four-fifths, 275 more would go, making over 500 schools in all. But there was another restriction which came into operation even on the remnant, and that was the necessity for the provision of accommodation in other schools for the minority of the children. That provision might act exceedingly cruelly and unjustly. He thought that in many cases it was entirely unnecessary. He was amazed when he discovered the extent to which Protestant children had availed themselves of Catholic schools. He was under the impression until about two months ago that there was no considerable proportion of Protestant children in the Catholic schools. It was a revelation to him that a minority of one-fifth would go out of the 247 Catholic schools. How did it come about that Protestant children came into these schools while in nineteen-twentieths of the cases there was ample accommodation for them in other schools? In many of these cases where children were sent to Catholic schools they deliberately passed the doors of board schools. In other cases they were sent to Catholic schools because the distance was a little less. One of the reasons was that the parents preferred the smaller classes in the Catholic schools. In many instances the parents of froward children sent them to the Catholic schools because the nuns produced better results in making them more obedient. These children came into the Catholic schools of their own free choice, and they enjoyed the hospitality of the schools, built with Catholics' own money, and Catholics had never endeavoured to make these schools the means of proselytising. Was it now to be put in the power of the parents of those children to take away the schools from Catholics and turn them into public elementary schools? That was he thought a very cruel injustice, and he hoped the Government would reconsider the question later on. In his opinion, after careful inquiry, Clause 4 in its present shape would not even give Catholics the choice of admission to half their schools. What was to become of the other half? The Minister for Education had spoken without any bitterness and in no unfair way, but it was one thing to deal with the speeches made on behalf of the Government, and another thing to deal with the clause. How could Catholics receive otherwise than coldly a clause which gave them the very inefficient protection he had endeavoured to describe? The hon. and learned Member for South Longford had dealt with this question. What did the Government propose to do with these Catholic schools? Did they really seriously propose to take 500 of the Catholic schools and offer no manner of relief whatever? Even with the contracting-out proposal, or as they described it, "the kicking-out proposal," they were to be left on the roadside to starve without the aid of rates or taxes, or the children were to be ordered to sacrifice their consciences and to go into the common schools of the country and to submit to the Protestant teaching which was to be the normal teaching in the schools. People talked about resistance! He did not want to indulge in any language of provocation, but could Nonconformists, while seeking to maintain and be faithful to the name and traditions of Liberalism, ask Catholics to submit to treatment of this kind, when they had set them an example of resisting the law when endeavouring to get a grievance remedied? He had received a letter only to-day from Halifax, where the Catholics had a very fine school on which there had been spent an enormous sum of money which had all come out of the pockets of the poor people. They had 625 children on the roll. For cheapness this school was built outside the borough boundaries of Halifax, and it was a sad thing that many of the children had to walk two miles to it, passing on the way the doors of the palatial council schools, in the building of which Catholic rates had been used. Under the proposed restrictions the Catholic school in question would be cut off from all relief under this Act because it was just outside the borough boundaries. What were they going to do with these 620 children? Would the Liberal Party of England enter into a struggle with the parents after all the sacrifices they had made, in order to drive their children into the council schools of Halifax? He said they could not, and unless they made some of the modifications asked of them the Government would find they had undertaken something which would necessitate an Amending Bill later on. Catholics had been asked to trust the local authorities, but there could be no question of trusting the local authority here. He thought the local authority of Halifax would treat the Catholic school decently if they could, but they could not do it because it was outside the scope of the clause altogether. Let them consider for a moment this question of trusting the local authorities. Had hon. Members read the speeches delivered yesterday at the meeting of Nonconformists? He dared say that most hon. Members had read the speech of Mr. Hirst Hollowell. He did not say a word against Nonconformists for believing what they did, but in the face of that speech, and the declarations of other Nonconformist leaders — declarations of war against Clause 4, declarations of men representing large bodies of opinion in the country who had shown that for their convictions they were prepared to defy the law—were Catholics to be told that they were perfectly safe in the hands of the loca authorities? They trusted the local authorities to follow their own convictions. This question would be made a primary and dominant issue in every local election, and Mr. Hirst Hollowell and Dr. Clifford would be on the stump from end to end of England denouncing Clause 4 and inviting the local communities to rise in rebellion against it. If that was so, why appeal to Catholics to trust the local authorities? A Welsh Member had appealed to them by stating that the Welsh Members wished to trust Ireland with local control. He himself did not vote for the Welsh Coercion Act. The Nationalist Members were prepared to support the proposal to set up a Council for Wales. If the Welsh Members wanted a Parliament the Nationalist Members would support them. But this was a very different matter. He would ask hon. Members opposite whether, when the Nationalist Members made a demand for Catholic education in Ireland, they would give them their support. He believed they were willing to give them the control of their own affairs, but if they would not support the claim for Catholic education in Ireland why should they expect the Catholic Members in this House to vote for measures which in his judgment would subject to disability the poor people of this country? The right hon. Gentleman had said quite truly, that what religious education meant to Catholics was not a half-hour's teaching of the catechism, but the whole tone and spirit in which the teaching in the school was conducted. That was their difficulty; and there was no concession unless the tone and spirit of the school were to be in conformity with the faith of the parents of the children. As to the alternatives presented in the Government Amendment, it was idle for him to say that the occasions would be rare when the local authorities would refuse to give these facilities, especially when they deliberately offered to the public bodies in the country a substantial money bribe to throw the Catholic schools out of the National school system. Let them imagine an election vote, on the issue of some one, say, Dr. Clifford saying that the voters could not only salve their consciences by the way they voted, but that they would be able to keep the rates in their pockets. That would be an admirable inducement to the electors. That, he thought, was a complete answer to the case for the alternative proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. So far as the speeches of the Nonconformist Members were concerned, he had very little to find fault with them, but it was their votes and their action that he found fault with. The hon. Member for North West Norfolk, who was a leading Nonconformist, said, and he agreed with him, that it would be unjust to put any penal consequences on Catholics who would send their children to Catholic schools. That was their whole case. But what were they going to do with the children of Catholics who were cut off from all benefit under the Clause? Supposing they refused to go to Protestant schools! Were they going to leave them in the streets? Supposing that the system of contracting out were to be adopted, on what principles would they calculate the grant to the Catholic schools which were thrust out of the national system. When they decided, on Clause 1, to have a form of religious teaching unacceptable and objectionable to Catholics, they put themselves under an obligation from which they could not escape to give them the opportunity of retaining in their schools the religious teaching that was acceptable to them. What Catholics said was that the religious teaching might be of a variable character. It might be Bible reading; it might be teaching with a good deal of dogma; but in their opinion it was Protestant teaching. Dr. Clifford said at a meeting in the Caxton Hall the previous day—

> "Cowper-Temple teaching was not Protestant in any theological or ecclesiastical sense, or he would oppose its being given at the State's expense. It was only civic Protestantism, which repudiated the Roman Catholic idea that the education of children should be under the control of the Church."

Accepting Dr. Clifford's definition for the sake of argument, that was just what Catholics objected to. They objected to the teaching probably more as civic Protestantism than as mere Protestantism. Were their rights as Catholics to be taken from them to teach civic Protestantism to other people's children, while the poor children of the Catholics were to be left without any assistance from the rates? Was that their idea of the fair play of Liberalism? Let Liberals be honest on this matter. If they proposed to retain Clause 4 in spite of the opposition of the Rev. Dr. Clifford and of the leaders of the extreme Nonconformist Party, let them retain it and accept all the logical consequences of its retention. Let them give to the Catholics and to the Anglicans who could not accept their simple religious Protestantism, equal fair play with themselves; and if the Catholics could not consent to pay rates in order that Cowper-Temple teaching should be taught in the schools, then the fair thing to do would be to authorise the Government to give to their poor schools, not a mere grant from the Exchequer, but a sum which they might calculate to be equal to the rates which the Catholics paid for teaching Protestantism in other schools. Religious liberty was a great thing; and he sympathised with those who fought for religious liberty in 1902. But those hon. Gentlemen were now on top, and were they going to commit the fatal mistake, because they now had the power, of not being satisfied with freeing their own shoulders from the burden of injustice? Would they not be satisfied until they had shifted that injustice on to those who were now in the minority? If they persisted in that course, they might drive this Bill through the House of Commons, but they would not settle the question and they would inflict on the Liberal Party a blow from which it would take them many long years to recover.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): I always listen to my hon. friend who has just sat down, not only with interest and admiration, but also with a certain amount of sympathy, even when he is enunciating opinions the very reverse of my own. He has in him something of a Jeremiah and something of a Cassandra, but to-day I think he has even out-Jeremiah'd and out-Cassandra'd himself in the prospect that he has disclosed of the future fate of the Catholic schools. I do not believe myself that one-tenth part of the mischief he has anticipated would ever take place under this Act. If I thought so I should not be so ardent a supporter of the clause as I am. But the hon. Member was not quite fair. He reiterated the fears that have been expressed of the tyrannical bigotry of local authorities in England, but he was full of compliments to my hon. friends behind me who are the representatives and the chosen men of those very localities where he anticipates such totally different treatment. I would venture to offer a word of advice to my hon. friend. Let him take care that he does not go further and fare worse. My hon. friend has pointed out what is very true, and what we all know, that, in his communion, what is wanted in the schools is something more than the teaching. It is the tone and spirit, the atmosphere, pervading the whole of the school from one end of the day to the other. Where will his atmosphere be when the only alternative offered from the other side of the House comes into force—the alternative of the State providing secular instruction and the indiscriminate liberty to all the sects to teach any religion they like? Where is his atmosphere, his spirit, his tone, in those circumstances? That solution is in very powerful hands; and let him make sure that, if this controversy comes to an end unfavourable to the present Bill, that will not be the fate of the schools in which he takes so keen and sincere an interest. I may be allowed personally to say that I feel almost the necessity of an apology for intervening in this discussion at all, because I have been enforcedly absent from the debates from first to last. I have nothing to apologise for in regard to that absence except that it added, to the other bitter feelings that it involved, the knowledge all the time that I was neglecting my duty as Leader of this House. But that bitterness, such as it was, was removed by the kind sympathy and consideration which I have received from the whole House. I do not intend to enter upon these detailed controversies, because it seems to me that they have been sufficiently discussed and that the Committee might very well come to a conclusion on this matter of "may" or "shall" without more delay. But I do think it right to state what appears to me to be the true position as viewed from the distance to which I have been relegated during the past two or three weeks. My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education said to-day a very true and obvious thing, but a thing that is sometimes forgotten, when he declared that this is an undenominational Bill and therefore every advocate of denominational education cannot find it to his mind. It would be a false Bill if it were to his mind. This Bill is an undenominational Bill, setting up an undenominational system, and we must regard it in that light. And what is the genesis of this Clause 4? In this country you cannot pursue any system, undenominational or other, in so complicated and controversial a matter as education, to the extreme length. The mistake which I think some of my hon. friends have been making lately is that they have got hold of some small idea, or some comparatively small point, and they wish to shape everything to the carrying out to its ultimate conclusion, to its extreme completion, that idea or that line of action. You cannot do that in this country. Therefore it was necessary in our undenominational Bill to recognise exceptions. Our idea was that in the ordinary schools there should be taught religion in the form of the common elements of Christianity. In the simplicity of my heart I thought that at least in the Church of England that would not have been obnoxious. The common elements of Christianity with, no doubt, a flavour of Protestantism in them—is that really distasteful to the Church of England as by law established? To my amazement a prelate of that Church says that Bible teaching is dangerous unless it is accompanied by his standards. His standards! Why, his standards are based on the Bible, and not the Bible on his standards. Still, we provided in our Bill for two days' teaching of special doctrines in order to meet the special desires and requirements of the Church. But the Catholics are in a different position. They have never failed to put forward as their ideal the full control of the school from the religious point of view. Therefore, it seemed to us that an exception must be attempted which might include the Catholics and also any members or ministers or authorities of the Established Church who are more Catholic than anything else, for, if that is the conception of a school, our general scheme does not meet it. Accordingly we introduced Clause 4, and what the Committee have been discussing for the last two days is not the principle of the clause, but the mere machinery by which that principle is to be carried out. On the part of the Government I have to say that the principle and the intention of the clause is as I have described it; and to that we are firmly wedded, and do not intend to depart in any degree from it. And when I turn to the machinery of the clause, I can only say that it has been the subject of the closest and most careful consideration, and that as it stands we believe it avoids more difficulties and accomplishes more advantages than any other machinery which could be invented for the purpose. We have the appeal, the mandamus as the ultimate authority, the non-payment of rent. We have what is called contracting-out, and the ballot in order to secure that the opinion expressed by the parents of the children is genuine. And here let me refer to the difficulty which has been harassing the soul of my hon. friend the Member for East Mayo. He referred to the dreadful fate of the minority of Protestant children who have been in the habit, with the wish and will of their parents, of attending Catholic schools. I am very glad to hear of that practice, because it shows a spirit of liberality and a desire to live and act in common. But my hon. friend is afraid that when this clause comes into operation these children will be left out in the cold.

MR. DILLON: No; but that these children might take our schools from us.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: These children will continue to come in as they are coming in now; and there can be no hardship on the Catholic schools, for their parents will not want special facilities. But to return to the question of the machinery, I say that we regard it as perfectly sufficient, under the control, as it will be, of the Board of Education, for carrying out the main purposes of the clause, which is essential to the main purpose of the Bill itself. Our object is, and has been throughout, to make the Bill fair and equitable, and to do away with the grievances that we complain of. The hon. Member for Waterford expressed great sympathy with the Nonconformists on account of their grievances under the Act of 1902. But he did not mention any other way of removing those grievances than the way we propose; and it is clear that, unless this Bill is passed, they will remain unremedied. I therefore appeal to those who have strong prejudices and high ideals not to run after their ideals and prejudices too far, but to give their support to a scheme which we think will benefit education and remove grievances, and, while giving preferences and exceptions which cannot be avoided, will do justice to the desires and interests of the people at large.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow me, in the first place, to express on behalf of my friends our full appreciation of the reasons which have prevented him from being present during these debates, and from taking that part which we would otherwise desire him to take in the discussion of a measure which has excited so much public feeling. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by threatening the hon. Member for East Mayo with a worse fate than that which it is proposed to inflict upon him should other hands than those of the Government be engaged in further dealing with the question of education. If the right hon. Gentleman had been able to be present at our debates he would have known that the feeling which this Bill has excited in the minds of members of the Church of England is not less deep and earnest than that to which the hon. Member for East Mayo has given expression. No one has suggested that this question could be settled without something in the nature of Clause 4. No settlement of the question could be complete which ignored the particular problem which Clause 4 is intended but fails to solve. You cannot deal with the education question without meeting the wishes of the denominations. I do not mean simply meeting the wishes of the Jews and the Roman Catholics. In speaking of meeting the wishes of those who approve of denominational teaching, I deliberately include the Church of England, and I say that any party who fails to recognise the depth of feeling of the Church of England upon this subject does not read aright the signs of the times. The right hon. Gentleman told us that the Cowper-Temple Clause was the common basis of all Christianity with a Protestant flavour. In other words, his view is that this House, or rather the local elected bodies in the country, are the people who are qualified to determine that which theologians and philosophers have been searching for in vain throughout the centuries, and yet which every town council is supposed to be able to understand by the mere light of natural reason. The extreme Nonconformists or those who speak for them, have repudiated the idea that Cowper-Temple teaching is their religion. They think themselves qualified to determine not only for themselves, but for all mankind; or they think the local authorities qualified, which is worse. I would rather have Dr. Clifford's opinion upon a purely theological subject than the opinion of persons who have had no instruction whatever in such matters. I thought I was paying a compliment, and I think a deserved one, to the efficiency with which eminent Nonconformist divines have pursued their theological studies. But the right hon. Gentleman's description of the very varied teaching which goes by the name of Cowper-Temple teaching, as containing all the common elements of Christianity with a Protestant flavour, is really absurd. Cowper-Temple teaching, I am told, is sometimes given in a manner which draws no distinction between Unitarianism and orthodox Christianity. The truth is that any attempt on the part of this House either to settle for the country or to delegate it to local authorities to settle what are the common elements of Christianity is altogether vain and absurd, and is wholly inconsistent with Liberal traditions and views of the relations which ought to subsist between the secular and the theological. They themselves are always talking of the propriety of leaving these questions to the denominations; yet in a spirit of airy confidence they are going to determine not merely what is to satisfy the Nonconformists, but what is to satisfy everybody else. That is a pretension as arrogant as was ever made by any church at any time in the world's history. The right hon. Gentleman bids us remember that this is a Bill framed not on denominational but on undenominational lines. In that effort it is not denied that the Government have produced a deep feeling of irritation among those who took seriously the agitation directed against the 1902 Bill, and who, if they were not passive resisters themselves, thought that the passive resisters were perfectly right. Clause 4 in any shape will unquestionably leave the grievance of persons of that class of the community wholly unrelieved. That is asserted by those who have a right to speak for the passive resisters. You therefore have with deliberate intent violated the feelings of those who were your most ardent supporters at the last election; and yet, having lost their support over Clause 4, you do not take the most ordinary precautions to make the clause satisfy those in whose interests you say, and truly say, you have endeavoured to frame it. A concession which was genuinely intended is so fenced round with precautions and conditions, you have left so many loopholes by which the Board of Education and the local authority may escape their obligation by the structure of your clause, and by the provisions which you have piled up one on top of the other, like Pelion upon Ossa and Olympus upon both, that nobody knows what is the principle crushed under this load of superfluous matter. You have so contrived it that those in whose interests you have framed it say with unanswerable force that their grievance, the burden you are putting on their conscience by the rest of your Bill, the injustice you are making them suffer by paying rates for other people's religion—all that remains unrelieved, and the only conceivable result of your Bill in its present shape is that you will leave the Church of England, the Church of Rome, the Jews—perhaps the Jews less than others—with a grievance they most bitterly feel, wholly unredressed, and you will leave those who are ranked among your best supporters with their consciences still offended. It seems to me the Government have blundered into a position which is open to almost every objection that can be urged, because their clause satisfies no conscience and pleases no party. This, at all events, is certain—and I say it with a full sense of responsibility—that if the Bill passes in its present shape, with Clause 4, even with the Government Amendments, it is inevitable that the Government measure will find ranged against it not merely the Roman Catholic feeling in the country, but an amount of feeling on the part of those belonging to the Established Church which no Government ought with a light heart to endeavour to arouse. I was amazed at one phrase of the right hon. Gentleman's.

He used words which, I think, were intended to indicate that the only opponents in the Anglican Church whom he had to fear or who were really anxious to see Clause 4 made effective were those whom he described as more Catholic than anything else. If that is the delusion under which the Government is blundering, surely no Government ever was blinder. I believe the feeling among the leaders of the Low Church Party of the Church of England, men like the Bishop of Liverpool and the Dean of Canterbury, men who are the protagonists of the Low Church section—these men are vehement in their opposition.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is worth while correcting the right hon. Gentleman in his recollection of what I said. I used the phrase with regard to opposition and disfavour as expressed to what I call elementary Christian doctrine.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not dispute the right hon. Gentleman's version of what he said; but I would respectfully point out that it does not substantially differ from the expression I attributed to him, because what those leaders of Protestant thought dislike among other things is this substitution of universal Cowper-Temple teaching for the present teaching given in denominational schools. Let the Government and every man who takes part in the approaching division understand that they are not merely dealing with Roman Catholics and Jews and a small section of the clergy and laity of the Established Church, but that they have against them, broadly speaking, the whole feeling of that Church, Low Church and High Church, and that the idea of proposing to the House and country a settlement which pleases neither the denominationalists nor the undenominationalists, and asking us to accept that as a final settlement of this tremendous problem is really to play with a great cause, idly to meddle with subjects which you cannot settle, to leave unredressed ancient wrongs, and to create a large body of new wrongs which must in their turn breed fresh difficulties for this House and the country.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) moved an Amendment providing that the local education authority might, "subject to an appeal to the Board of Education in the event of refusal," afford extended facilities for religious instruction of a special character. He said the Government had placed an Amendment on the Paper which anticipated his proposal. The Government Amendment would allow an appeal to the Board of Education, and would also permit contracting out. He asked the President of the Board of Education whether he could not divide that Amendment into two parts, one dealing with the appeal to the Board of Education which they could all support, and the other relating to contracting out.

Amendment proposed.

"In page 2, line 39, after the word 'may,' to insert the words 'subject to an appeal to the Board of Education in event of refusal.'"—(Dr. Macnamara.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BIRRELL did not think it possible to divide the Amendment of the Government in the form suggested. He was afraid it would have to remain as it stood.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether the Government would consider the propriety of introducing into their Amendment words which would give a direction to the Board of Education to take care that such an arrangement was made between owners of schools and the local authority as would cause religious education to be carried out on the lines to which each particular school had been accustomed. That was the policy of the Government. He was sure that it was a matter worth considering. If they were fortunate enough to reach the clause the subject would be raised, but if not, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would consider the propriety of doing what he had suggested.

MR. BIRRELL said he would consider the suggestion.

LORD R. CECIL said that under the Bill the appeal would lie with the parents if the local authority declined to act. Under the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, however, the appeal would lie with the owner. It appeared to him that it ought to be left to the parents to appeal and not to the owners of the school.

MR. BIRRELL thought it would be very undesirable to take away the appeal from the owners, who were a responsible set of persons who might be trusted to look after the interests of the school, whilst the parents might not be able to act with promptness. Whilst he could not alter the provision that the owners should be the appellants, this was the parents' clause, and he would consider whether words could be inserted to secure that parents should have power to appeal.

DR. MACNAMARA hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the suggestion he had made.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CAVE moved an Amendment to leave out the words "in an urban area" in line 1 on page 3. He did not think that anyone would suggest that the religious instruction of the children or the wishes of the parents were of less importance in a rural than in an urban area. He knew many rural parishes which had a population quite as large as 5,000, which was put down as the minimum for an urban area under Clause 4. In many cases the school in a rural parish was placed close to the boundary of the area, and served for the children of another rural area or even for some of the children in an adjoining urban area. He saw no reason why such a school should be treated in a different way from an urban school. Just outside Halifax there was a Roman Catholic school which served the children in the urban as well as in the rural area, and yet that school was to be entirely shut out from the advantages of Clause 4. He did not see any logical basis upon which such an exemption could be based. All the arguments they had heard with regard to urban districts were equally applicable to rural areas. Perhaps the limitation would be defended on the ground that it was impossible in many rural areas to find sufficient schools to deal with all denominations. If so, the answer was that such a case was fully covered by condition (b) of this clause. No doubt that condition, if it remained as it stood in the Bill, might have the effect of excluding from the clause (if extended to rural areas) many single-school areas; but that difficulty would be met by a subsequent Amendment, by which it was proposed that it should be made a condition of giving special facilities that the owners should provide for giving to the children of dissenting denominations religious instruction of the kind the parents desired either in the school itself or in some neighbouring school. He felt sure the Committee would recognise the importance of this Amendment, and he hoped the Government would accept it.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 1, to leave out the words "in an urban area."—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

*MR. LOUGH agreed that there was something to be said in favour of the Amendment. He would remind the Committee, however, that the Government had made a very great concession in the clause as it now stood. The object of this Bill was to found a system of State education and here a broad exception was made. The two exceptions laid down in Sub-sections (a) and (b) were not sufficient, and they required the words of the clause as well. The ballot would be an inconvenient procedure to work in country villages, where there might be great objections to canvassing and pressure that might be brought to bear on one side or the other. There would be considerable difficulty in putting Sub-section (b) into operation in the rural areas. There might be a school two or three miles off. Would that be conceived to be accommodation? In some country areas there were wide notions as to the distance a child ought to walk. This clause had been described as one which made provision for Jews and Roman Catholics, but it should be remembered that a great number belonging to other religious sects would be able to take advantage of it. The Church of England would be able to take advantage of this clause to a larger extent than the Roman Catholics or the Jews. The Returns showed that in the urban areas as defined by the clause there were 4,371 denominational schools with an average attendance of 1,500,000 scholars, or three-fifths of all the scholars attending denominational schools in England and Wales. Many of these schools would be able to take advantage of this provision. There were in the country districts 9,700 other denominational schools, but they contained only 1,000,000 scholars. It would be admitted that a case had to be made out for the distinction drawn between urban and rural schools, and the truth was that this was part of the protection which Nonconformists received under the Bill. This was an attempt to deal with the difficulties of which the Nonconformists complained. The Government had been protecting Church of England interests in Clause 3 and Roman Catholic interests under Clause 4, but surely those of Nonconformists ought not to be entirely lost sight of. It was amongst those 9,700 rural schools that the Nonconformists had felt the intolerable strain; and surely they ought to have a look in somewhere. It would be impossible to provide the same facilities in the rural as in the urban schools, but his whole sympathy was on the side of dealing with them in the most liberal spirit with the various claims which would be made for facilities under the Bill. He believed that in the small schools in the country areas, if a fair view was taken of the construction of the Bill, they would be able to lead with their religious requirements in a satisfactory way. It should be remembered that the schools would be taken over for a small number of hours for the purposes of public elementary education. They would be taken by the public authority only for five days a week, and if it was desired to give the children additional religious instruction it could be done after school hours, and also on Saturday and Sunday when the schools would remain available for that purpose. Most fair-minded men would agree that in the one-school areas by a reasonable use of the facilities that would remain out of school hours it would be possible to make any provision necessary to meet religious requirements so far as Protestant children were concerned. As to the position of the Roman Catholics, 77 per cent. of all the Roman Catholic schools were in the urban areas with a population of over 5,000, while 91 per cent. of the Roman Catholic children were in those urban schools. The clause was conceived in a large and liberal sense, and it granted great facilities. He admitted that from the extreme denominational point of view the clause might not be altogether satisfactory, but in making that admission the Committee should bear in mind the extreme difficulty surrounding the whole question, and when they did so he was sure that they would feel it to be hard to make any improvement in the scheme which the Government had laid down. He could not see his way to accept the Amendment.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford) said the question the Committee had to consider now was whether any distinction could really be drawn in regard to this matter between the urban districts and the districts which were not technically urban. He maintained that there was no logical distinction whatever between the two. The only reason which the hon. Gentleman had given as to why similar arrangements should not be provided for the rural districts as were provided by this clause for the urban districts of 5,000 inhabitants was the rustic stupidity of the children. Perhaps he had by accident, both politically and in other capacities, had a closer acquaintance with the parents of children in the rural districts than had the hon. Gentleman, and he held that they were as qualified to take a deep interest in the religious education of the children as the parents of the children to whom this clause would apply, and to form an opinion as to what that religious instruction should be. He did not altogether agree with the hon. Member for Kingston in regard to the distinction between the single-school districts and other districts, but as that question did not arise on the present Amendment he would not pursue the subject. In the division which he had the honour to represent there were very few Roman Catholics. They were a very Protestant people; but there was one small Roman Catholic community in the division which maintained a school in a rural district, and he had no doubt that that school was as efficient as the other schools in that part of the country. What logical reason was there for making a distinction between that elementary school and an elementary school in an urban district with 5,000 population, and why should not both receive the same treatment? He submitted that the Amendment ought to receive more serious consideration from the Government.

*MR. STARKEY (Nottinghamshire, Newark) said that as the representative of an agricultural constituency he wished to point out how very hard the rural districts of England would be hit by this particular clause. The only hope of the rural schools being able to continue to give religious education as at present was by having the assistance of the rates. If the four-fifths provision would satisfy the people and appease all dissensions in regard to the religious difficulty in urban districts, why should not the same principle be extended to rural districts? If the country schools did not come within the four-fifths provision how were they to provide teachers for the children? It was quite true that on two days of the week the children were to be given religious instruction, but who was to give it? Their own teachers were forbidden to give it. The Government had given the country to understand that they were anxious to get the people back to the land, but was it likely that they would get the people back to the land if they were made to suffer the disadvantages to which he had referred? Anyone who had had the benefit of having his children brought up in the faith he believed in would remain in the urban areas, and refuse to go back to the rural districts. The Report of the Secretary to the Education Committee of the Nottingham County Council said that the number of children in average attendance in the council schools in the rural districts was 24,963, and in the urban areas 16,888. The net cost per child in the urban areas was 12s. 9d., and in the rural 10s. 7d. The total cost in the urban area was £16,865, and the rural area £13,527. The general rate raised per child in the urban school area was 10s. 10d., and in the rural £1. There was this great difference in the rate between the council school area chiefly urban, and the voluntary school district chiefly rural. If this were perpetuated and it were only permissible to give religious instruction in the voluntary schools upon two days of the week at their own expense, it would not lessen the feeling of injustice that now existed or be in any way beneficial. In the rural areas their only hope of being able to give religious instruction to their children lay in their being included in the four-fifths division.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.) said that this clause raised a matter of very great importance. Catholics did not press so strongly the case of their schools in single school areas, because they recognised that in those areas a very considerable Nonconformist grievance existed; but the number of their schools which would be injuriously affected by the clause as at present drawn was very large indeed. The hon. Member for West Islington asked them to believe that the Catholic schools had been very well treated inasmuch as a comparatively small percentage of Catholic children would be excluded by the clause as it now stood.

MR. LOUGH said that what he had stated was that it would not exceed 9 per cent.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE said that at the present moment in the rural districts the Catholic community would under the Bill lose the grants for 188 Catholic schools. In addition to the 188 Catholic schools in rural districts which would be lost to the Catholics by this Bill in urban districts, under the 5,000 limit there were fifty-five which also would be lost to them. Then came the schools which would be affected by the four-fifths limit—a very serious thing for them—and their loss then would number 254. In all, therefore, they would lose 497 schools, to say nothing of the case of the remaining Catholic schools which would not continue to have the requisite four-fifths and would also be ruled out. It might be said that nearly half of the Catholic schools in the country would be lost to the Catholics by this Bill. The schools might only contain a small number of pupils, but still, from the Catholic point of view, it was a very serious matter. They could not consent to have fifty per cent. of their schools swept away. If the Government would agree to eliminate those schools in the urban area their grievance would be very largely reduced, although it would not be taken away altogether. In view of the concession which they had made in not claiming relief in regard to their schools in single school areas, he thought the Committee might favourably consider any proposal which would lessen their loss.

LORD R. CECIL wished to know how many schools the Roman Catholics had in single school areas.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE said he could not give the figures exactly, but it was a small number. It was perhaps ten or twelve schools, but although the concession they made might not be a large one, still it was as far as they could go to meet the Nonconformist case. If the Government persisted in carrying out their proposals they would certainly create in the minds of Catholics a feeling of irritation, and they would not submit to this grievance. They did not grudge the Church of England anything which she could gain under the Bill, nor did they grudge any other denomination anything which they could obtain, but their concern was with their own schools, and he hoped the Government would reconsider the undoubted grievance which they had.

*MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) said the hon. Member for North Wexford must be under some misapprehension as to the meaning of the hon. Member for West Islington when he spoke of the Church of England being a gainer by this Bill. Even the Parliamentary-Secretary with his fervid imagination could not have been, he was sure, led into saying that. It was because of the deep feeling of the great majority of the people whom he represented, a large body of the clergy and laymen of the Church of England, that he thought it right to rise and express his view in regard to the proposals of the Government. Because the Government had dealt with the difficulties which had arisen in regard to small minorities they claimed to have dealt with the whole question of religious education, but surely there was a large majority whose claims ought no less to be dealt with. What religious body was most affected by this Bill, and who were the people who would be most affected? Surely it was the Church of England—that is, the clergy and laity of that Church. It was not only the clergy who objected to the Bill; it was not even "the ecclesiastically-minded laymen" who were concerned, and who felt this grievance, but the laity generally were aroused upon the subject. That was shown by the public meetings which had been held to protest against the Bill. Anybody who had attended those meetings or had heard of them, was bound to be struck by the fact that they were largely composed of laymen, and nobody who knew the signs of the times could deny that the minds of the clergy and the laity had been stirred to a depth to which he had never seen it stirred before. He had attended a large number of religious and political meetings, and he had never seen such depth of feeling evinced as had been aroused by this Bill. Did the Government think it wise to outrage the conscience of what everybody must admit to be a great religious community, which had done and was still doing great service to the country? Was it right that the interests of the Church of England, who were principally concerned, should be neglected? If the Government minimised these facilities, and confined them to the urban areas, they were excluding from the benefits of the Bill a vast number of the schools in the rural districts which had done, and were still doing, great educational service to the country. The hon. Baronet had spoken of the great sacrifices which members of his communion had made for the purpose of maintaining their schools. They had made no greater sacrifices than the members of the Church of England had made assisted by their clergy, who out of slender pittances had founded and maintained Church schools. He respected the views of Roman Catholics to whom this clause was in the main a concession. Why should it stop short of recognising the sacrifices made by the clergy and laity of the Church of England? The answer which would be made was, he knew, the grievances of Nonconformists in rural parishes, but what was the good of substituting one grievance for another, and why to remedy the grievance of the Nonconformist should the Government inflict an injury upon the Church? The grievance of the Nonconformists was that they had no schools of their own in rural districts, and that they had to contribute to the maintenance of Church schools. As to the first grievance, it had always struck him as curious that in the Principality of Wales, which was a typical instance, while Nonconformists could build places of worship they never, or seldom at all events, built schools, but contentedly sent their children to Church of England schools. Now, at the beginning of the twentieth century, they had raised the grievance of the Nonconformist conscience. Was it not time that Church of England people should say that they too had a conscience? He had, like the passive resisters, a grievance in that he had to contribute to a school board rate although he did not agree with the undenominational character of the teaching afforded under it. What would be the grievance upon his conscience hereafter when besides the London County Council Education Rate he had to contribute to the maintenance of the schools that he had supported for so many years, in which a form of religious instruction was hereafter to be given of which he did not approve? It might be said that that was a mean and paltry way of looking at it, but his conscience disapproved of it and rebelled against it, and was not his conscience as well worthy to be considered as the conscience of any Nonconformist? It was that of which he complained—that there was no remedying of a grievance, but the substitution of a new grievance for an old, and putting a new grievance on the consciences of what he ventured to believe was the majority of this country. He could not say they were the majority, because whenever they asked for a religious census they were refused, and it might be that the Nonconformists were the majority as they stated. He hoped he had said enough on this subject to show that he felt very strongly upon it. He had tried to express himself in a moderate manner, but he warned the right hon. Gentleman that unless the Government made some concession and did not rest content with only remedying the wrong of one religious minority, so far from settling this great educational question they would raise, in the most peaceable and least agitative parts of the country, the ordinary quiet country clergy and laity of the Church of England, and leave in the breasts of such people a feeling of irritation and resentment that it would take years to allay.

MR. JOHN REDMOND thought it was to be regretted that this important matter was being discussed in so thin a House. Clause 4 was put into the Bill to meet the Catholic case, but the figures they had went to show that under its provisions —with regard to the 5,000 population area and the four-fifths —one half of the Catholic schools would be excluded altogether. He did not know whether those figures had been brought forcibly before the right hon. Gentleman as yet. He had not heard him refer to or deal with them, and he asked him to make some statement with reference to them now. It was not possible that the right hon. Gentleman could be satisfied with the state of things in which the clause now stood, in so far as it only applied to one-half of the Roman Catholic schools. If the 5,000 population area was taken alone, 246 Roman Catholic schools out of 1,012 were excluded. There were not many of these single school areas, and so far as he was concerned he was very anxious that the Nonconformist grievance with regard to the single school areas should be completely met, and reduced in regard to those schools which lay between the single school areas and the 5,000 suburban areas. He wanted to know what was to become of those schools which were excluded. He did not want to repeat the arguments, but he desired to represent to the right hon. Gentleman that they were in an entirely different position from the Church schools. The Church schools could take advantage of Clause 3, but these schools would not. What, then, was to become of them? The right hon. Gentleman must surely have come to some conclusion as to what the treatment was to be with regard to disposition of these schools. The figures read to the Committee were fallacious, because they were told that 77 per cent. of these schools would be admitted, and that 91 per cent. of the Catholic children attending school in England would be admitted.

MR. LOUGH: So far as this Amendment is concerned.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said that that was the point: it did not put the whole case before the Committee, because under the operation of the clause, taking all the limitations together, far more than nine per cent. would be excluded. He wanted to know what was to become of these schools, and he rose simply to point out the vital importance of this matter and to say that notwithstanding the way in which their hopes had been dashed by the decisions of the Committee and of the Government, he was convinced that the right hon. Gentleman had something to say with reference to these schools. He hoped he would say it now.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) said he hoped the Government would not be in too conceding a frame of mind. After all, for what purpose did the schools exist? They existed for five days a week and for five hours a day for the purpose of fitting the children in them for this life and enabling them to make a living. It had been assumed too often in these debates that if the children in these schools did not, from the age of five to the age of twelve or thirteen, get denominational instruction, they never did get it. That was not true, but the converse of that was practically true. If they did not get during that period a satisfactory elementary education in general knowledge to fit them for this life and enable them to get a living, they never did get it. The other purpose of these schools, was that of denominational instruction, and that could be and was given out of school hours in churches and chapels, and could be and was continued after the child's school life. He pleaded that nothing should be done that would lessen the efficiency of the schools in these areas, and lessen the efficiency and the teaching in them for five hours a day on the five days of the week. The proposal before the Committee would tend to multiply the number of small schools in the country, and where they got small schools the tendency was to decrease the efficiency, and therefore anything that tended to multiply the number of small schools and keep down the number of the larger schools tended to defeat the specific purpose of those schools for five hours a day on five days of the week. He asked the right hon. Gentleman not to be in too conceding a mood in his great desire to conciliate opposition on an important, but not the most important, part of the Bill, which was to fit the children for this life. Another reason why the Amendment should not be accepted was that it would extend the area of the possible application of that very vicious and retrograde principle of allowing schools to contract themselves out of the Bill and out of the advantage of local control and supervision. He did not think the contracting-out proposal pleased anybody, and it was bad educationally. He opposed the Amendment, and supported the clause as it stood.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) said he had an Amendment on the Paper to the same effect as the one under discussion. The hon. Member for West Nottingham, had defined the real abyss which separated him from some of them. The hon. Gentleman thought that getting on in life was the thing for which schools were established. Churchmen did not believe it, and they rejected it. It was therefore impossible for the hon. Gentleman and them to get into touch on this question. The clause denied the rights of conscience to country areas. Yet the right and duty of worshipping God was the same in the country as in the town. The duties of parents to children were the same in Stoke Poges as in London or Birmingham. It would be just as reasonable to have a local limitation to the study of Shakespeare or Milton. A certain measure of freedom was given to some districts because they were big; in other districts freedom was curtailed because they were little. There was no principle whatever in this strange, almost insane, distinction. Again and again it had been said, chiefly by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the education question could not be properly discussed unless as a preliminary to discussion logic was thrown to the dogs. Here were thrown to the dogs not only logic but principle also, and there seemed to be nothing left but the paper on which the Bill was written, the bias, and, in some cases, the downright hatred of the Church against which the Bill was directed. The clause was an instance of the intolerance of the whole Bill, and an illustration of the words "New Presbyter is old Priest large writ."

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) expressed the opinion that the question asked by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford as to what was to become of the 246 rural Catholic schools which would be excluded from the operation of Clause 4 ought to receive an answer. The Government had admitted that those schools had a right to exceptional treatment, and yet by the adoption of an arbitrary limit which could not be defended they would be excluded from the consideration extended to more fortunate schools in urban districts, and there would be a perpetuation of the condition of passive resistance on the part of a different section of the community. The real grievance which the Bill ought to remedy was the case of the single school area. The Nonconformists had a distinct grievance under the Act of 1902, and as long as they got clear of that he did not see why Catholic schools which complied with the conditions and safeguards embodied in the clause should not receive the benefit of these extended facilities whether they were situated in urban or in rural areas.

*COLONEL WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire, W.) said the speech to which the Committee had just listened appeared to assume that the Roman Catholic religion was the one which wanted protection in this country. He should like to ask what was the special reason why the Roman Catholic religion should be protected above other forms of Christianity, and why the same treatment should not be meted out to all sects. The hon. Member for West Nottingham had spoken as if education were purely secular, and that nothing was education unless it were secular. He would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite who differed from him as to the form of religious education, whether education was complete without religion. Unless education included religion it would prove a mere snowman, which would melt away under the heat of the turmoil of daily life and the pressure of competition. He was challenged the other day as to whether Cowper-Temple teaching was not a very good foundation for the teaching of religion. It was a foundation of a sort, but it was the loose bricks without the mortar to hold them together. He would much rather a child of his was brought up in a Roman Catholic school than in an undenominational school. The child would at least have a better chance of becoming a good citizen. No doubt some hon. Members would claim that secularism was religion, but where did morality come from.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The hon. Member is making a Second Reading speech.

*COLONEL WILLIAMS asked why the children in the country should be debarred from having what the children in the towns might have. He knew an urban area with a population of 5,500, and the schools in that area could exercise this option, but in a school 200 yards outside that area they could not have the same teaching: why should they not have it? If these facilities were granted in urban areas why should they not be granted in rural areas? If it was right for one area, surely it was right for the other. If hon. Members thought they were giving freedom or justice, or showing tolerance by refusing to the children in the country what they had given to the children in the towns, they were very much mistaken, and the people in the country would show very forcibly when they got the opportunity that they were in favour of real freedom and not a sham tolerance.

MR. STUART (Sunderland) found a difficulty in reconciling the statements, on the one hand, that 267 Roman Catholic schools would be excluded under the Bill as it stood, and, on the other hand, that 9 per cent. of the children would be excluded. He would himself have been content to have seen different treatment shown to Roman Catholic schools, and would have liked to have seen the line drawn to include a larger number of them. He did not see any reason for stopping at urban areas more than any other.

MR. LOUGH said the figures were correct, and the explanation was that the schools were small. With regard to what the hon. Member for Sunderland had suggested he was quite sure that the Committee would not agree to give more facilities to Roman Catholics than to other denominations, and he did not think the House would have looked at the Bill had it been drawn on those lines. He appealed to the Committee to come to a decision upon this Amendment.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hampshire, Basingstoke) agreed that this was an Amendment second only in importance to that with which the Committee recently dealt. They had been engaged for the greater part of two days in a debate upon the merits of denominational teaching, and this was an Amendment to decide whether or not those rights and privileges were to be extended to all the country areas. He deplored the manner in which the debate was being conducted, and could not believe that the Government would leave the question with no better defence than the Committee had heard. There was a strong suspicion that this matter was being "gerrymandered" by the Government and Nonconformists to give as large a bribe as they could to Roman Catholics and as little relief as possible to Church of England schools. If the Government did not desire that impression to get abroad they would have to make some better defence of this exclusion than had yet been attempted. This was an Amendment which threw the onus of proof upon the Government. It was not for the Opposition to show cause why a right or privilege should be extended to the whole country; it was for the Government to show cause why it should be restricted to urban areas. He submitted that any man who had resolved to support Clause 4 ought to support this Amendment. What was the principle upon which the Government had acted in introducing Clause 4? It was the principle that where they could get it without loss of educational efficiency or risk of religious difficulty, denominational education was a right and a good thing. If that was not the principle, the Government had no right to introduce Clause 4. The onus was upon the Government to show why the right to denominational teaching should not be extended to all. The first reason given by the Secretary to the Board of Education for restricting this right to the towns was that the people in the country were so illiterate and so stupid that they could not grapple with the intricacies of the ballot. If that was so, why had they the Parliamentary and the municipal franchise? If he had not heard those words spoken, he would not have believed that any Minister of the Crown would stand up and address such an argument to the House of Commons. The next ground upon which the Committee were asked to agree to this restriction was that there might not be available accommodation elsewhere. That begged the whole question, for unless there was available accommodation elsewhere Clause 4 did not apply at all. In asking the Committee to adopt this proposal the Government practically said, "Where you get the necessary majority, where you have available school accommodation for the minority, and where all the conditions are complied with, then if you live in a town you shall have certain privileges, but if you live in the country you shall not." It was for the Government to defend such a position as that. The third ground given by the hon. Gentleman in support of the restriction was that country schools were smaller than urban schools. He did not see anything in that argument. If four-fifths of the people in a town were to have a right, he did not see why the same proportion of their brethren in the country should not have the same right. Another reason stated was that the privileges under Clause 3 would do very nicely for the Church of England. It was true that if they could not get Clause 4 amended they would have to be content with Clause 3. But in the urban districts, both Clauses 3 and 4 were to apply, and he wished to know upon what ground a distinction was to be made in regard to Clause 4 in the country districts. If Clause 3 would do, why did the Government introduce Clause 4 for the towns? The view of Church people was that this was an illogical and indefensible distinction which no man could justify to his conscience, and that it had been introduced because it was desired to buy off the formidable opposition of the Roman Catholic Church. It was common knowledge that the Roman Catholic schools were situated to a large extent in urban areas. The intention of this distinction could be gathered by the effect which it would produce. By Clause 4 about 75 per cent. of the Roman Catholic schools would be saved, while only about 25 per cent. of the Church schools would be saved. This was striking people in the country as a flagrant injustice. It would be a piece of cynicism if the Government allowed this matter to go to a division without a more adequate attempt to find some real defence for a distinction so palpably unfair, so grossly unjust, and so prima facie indefensible. The distinction which was drawn between the urban and the rural districts would be one of the most powerful factors in bringing about the inevitable destruction of the Bill.

*MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek) said he desired to call attention to two Catholic schools in his constituency. They were in the villages of Tean and Dilhorne which were Catholic villages from before the Reformation in England. Seeing that they were in rural areas he was anxious to know what was going to become of them. He was aware that in establishing a great system it was inevitable that here and there hardships should be created. He would not in the least think of opposing the Government, but if something could be done in reference to such schools as these he would be glad.

*Mr. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry) said that Clause 4 would absolutely wreck the Church schools in the rural districts. Some hon. Members had said that Clause 3 gave the Church schools more than they could have expected to receive. He maintained that Clause 3 gave nothing to these schools. It said that if the local authority condescended to make an agreement with them the owners of a school could arrange on two days of the week for denominational teaching out of school hours by teachers other than those of the school. That they could have without the clause at all, and there was absolutely nothing done for rural Church schools under Clause 3. Therefore he said that under this clause the Government were doing a monstrous and gross injustice. Some hon. Members had raised doubts upon the question as to whether the Church was strongly opposed to the Bill. All he could say was that in the division which he had the honour represent, they were violently opposed to it. It was not because they did not recognise that there was still a Nonconformist grievance in country districts that they were not prepared to welcome this Bill.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member must not discuss the Bill, but must confine his observations to the Amendment.

*Mr. BRIDGEMAN said that with all respect he thought he was discussing the effect of this Bill upon rural schools.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN said that when he interrupted, the hon. Gentleman was pointing out the objection of the Church of England to the Bill itself, whereas he should confine his observations to the Amendment which had been proposed to this particular clause.

*Mr. BRIDGEMAN said he was supporting the Amendment on behalf of the Church of England, and he supported it because although members of that Church felt there was a grievance on the part of Nonconformists which might be redressed, it was not being redressed by this or any other clause of the Bill. Moreover, there was being imposed upon Churchmen by this clause a grievance which was much greater than was generally supposed. Several speakers had referred to this matter as if the only question of importance was that which had reference to Roman Catholic schools. A Ministerialist had suggested that the line should be drawn in some other way so as to include more Roman Catholic schools, and it was said that the Roman Catholics had a right to say that they objected to Cowper-Temple teaching, but that members of the Church of England had not. The hon. Member for Waterford had said that he looked upon Cowper-Temple teaching as the religion of Protestantism, but speaking from the Church of England point of view he might say that he regarded it as the religion of Nonconformity. He objected to it as insufficient religious education for his children. Moreover, there were different kinds of Cowper-Temple teaching, and he did not gather that under this Bill the best kind would be insisted upon. In some cases it meant no religion at all. It meant the simple reading of the Bible, without note or comment. He did not call that sufficient, and the only good that could be obtained from Cowper-Templeism must be obtained when the teacher believed the instruction he was affording and taught it with conviction. But such a system would not satisfy Dr. Clifford, who said that the teaching should consist merely of the ethical, historical, and literary study of the Bible as a book of history. As a member of the Church of England he said that members of that Church had just as much right to say that they objected to a religion which was forced down their throats, as the Roman Catholics had. If anyone doubted that this religion which was going to be forced upon rural schools was the religion of Nonconformity he should like to allude to the words which were used by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education earlier in the debate. The right hon. Gentleman said that those who knew the struggle the Nonconformists had had to go through for the maintenance of Nonconformity would not wonder that they rejoiced at the opportunity which was being offered to them to acquire in their village the freedom which they sought, and at the joy and pride which they felt in the fact that it might be their own. If the religion which was to be taught was to be their own, he thought he was justified in saying that the religion which was to be taught would satisfy Nonconformists. He did not in the least complain that they should have that religion or that they should have anything else, but what he did complain of was that they should dictate to him as to the religion which he should impart to his children. He thought he had as much right to lay down what religion should be given to his children as the Nonconformist had to say what kind of instruction should be imparted to his. He quite believed that the grievance in the rural districts had been a real one, and that in some parishes the Nonconformist felt that owing to the idiosyncrasies of some of the clergy the children were being taught that of which they did not approve. The parents did not want in those cases to withdraw their children from religious teaching altogether, but they considered that the clergyman taught them religion in a way which was objectionable. No reasonable person could object to the children having, instead of objectionable religious teaching, Cowper-Templeism, but this Bill did not propose that. It proposed to sweep away the Church curriculum and to force upon children religious instruction of which the parents might in ninety-nine cases out of 100 disapprove. He hoped the Government would show them some logical reason why it was right and just that the Roman Catholics should have their consciences considered, and they of the Church of England should not. Why should the parents in urban schools moreover be given the right to have their consciences considered, while the same right was denied to the parents in rural districts. This question could be very easily solved in rural districts by giving fair play all round. That would meet the wishes of Church people as well as Nonconformists. There were very few schools in which there was only one teacher. As a matter of fact he believed there were only 2,000 departments—not schools—in which there was only one teacher and so, perhaps, in one-fifteenth of the cases there might be some difficulty in arranging the classes in regard to denominational or undenominational education, but in fourteen-fifteenths there would be no difficulty at all. Therefore, they were entitled to some explanation from the Government. If the right hon. Gentleman had said that this principle was to be applied to single-school areas there would be some argument in it, but the Government had not said that. In each of two parishes in which he was interested there were two schools and it would be possible to make arrangements which would suit everybody, and he could not understand why this arbitrary distinction should be made and why people in rural districts should not have the same chance of doing that which they did in urban districts. The whole proposal was absurdly illogical and impossible, and he asked the Government to extract themselves from the entangled position in which they now stood and put themselves in a position which they could defend as one of principle and in which they could not be assailed from every side as they were at present.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) appealed to the Committee to pass on to other subjects connected with the clause, and pointed out that in view of the fact that the debate would be compulsorily determined at a given moment it was not desirable that Members should take up too much time in discussing one question. Nor was it desirable that members of the Government should occupy too much of the time which primarily belonged to the Opposition, and after all he could only say what had been said before in reply to the contentions of hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House. But he did want to make some observations in reply to the speech to which they had just listened, and two or three previous speeches. The hon. Member for the Oswestry Division had said that this clause absolutely wrecked Church of England schools in rural districts, and the hon. Member who preceded him spoke of the Bill as saving only 25 per cent. of the Church schools as against 75 per cent. of the Roman Catholic schools. Now he did ask hon. Members, not with any expectation that it would have any effect, whether in saying this they were just to the Bill or even just to their own case. Was it right to talk of Church of England schools as being wrecked or lost in view of the special facilities for religious education provided by Clause 3? Members of the Church of England were not entitled to speak of these special facilities in the same way as members of the Roman Catholic Church. [OPPOSITION cries of "Why not?"] Because, in the Church of Rome, the Church was the supreme authority in interpreting the Bible, a view which was directly contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England. There was therefore that distinction between members of the Church of England and members of the Roman Catholic Church. The Roman Catholic Church had laid it down for all time that their authority was supreme in interpreting the Bible, whereas the Church of England had also laid it down for all time that the Bible was to be the sole and supreme test in deciding matters of doctrine. If he discussed these matters it was only in answer to the challenge of hon. Members opposite, and his contention was that they were not entitled as Churchmen to say that their schools would be lost and wrecked, because the religious education in the schools would continue to be given as amply and sufficiently as it had been given in the past. Such religious education as had been given would be continued and maintained, even more fully than ever, at the public cost. The Church of England would continue their schools at the public cost, and would continue to give precisely the same education as had been given before, and yet hon. Members used such extravagant language about their schools being wrecked.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) said they had reached a most interesting development of the argument in support of the Bill. They had always regarded Clause 4 as giving a modicum of religious freedom to all denominations equally considered, but the discussion had thrown light upon the subject and had shown that advantages were to be secured by particular denominations while others were not so favoured. They had a different explanation given of Clause 4 now from that which was given on the Second Reading. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the clause was put in with a special view of meeting the Roman Catholics. That meant that the clause was put in not with the idea of preserving religious liberty but in order to secure the Irish vote. The Minister for Education, however, in winding up the debate, said the clause was intended to be a charter of educational freedom to the village. Therefore, according to the President of the Board of Education, the clause was intended not so much to let the Roman Catholics in as to keep the Church of England out. Now they were informed by the Solicitor-General that the proposals of the Bill were based in some way not explained on the decrees of the Council of Trent.

SIR W. ROBSON denied that the right hon. Gentleman correctly interpreted his words. He had simply asked why Protestants should object to Bible teaching.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON was glad to ascertain that the learned Solicitor-General did not see any close connection between the Council of Trent and the 5,000 limit of population, but he had gathered that from his words. What was the distinction to be drawn in this matter? Was it population? If so he ventured to say it was a defective basis if the statistics of the various parishes or urban districts were examined. He knew of one single rural parish with a population of 11,000, and in this parish there were three council schools and one voluntary school. There could be no reason why that voluntary school should be excluded from the privileges of Clause 4 was the distinction based on provision of council school accommodation. If so, it was equally fallacious, for there were large towns in which all the schools were voluntary schools, and these would be excluded from the clause.. The distinction which it was sought to draw was absolutely meaningless and could only be based upon some political consideration, which had nothing to do with religious education, or with anything to which one could attach any reasonable motive unless it was a political motive such as appeared to be suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Education. Many rural parishes had two schools, and there was no difficulty in providing accommodation for the denominations; and he submitted that where facilities were wanted, and could be granted without injustice or inconvenience, they should be granted. He knew a case of a school in a rural parish established for the instruction of the poor in the principles of the Church, of England, and for no other purpose. There was not, he understood, in the parish, one dissenter from the Church of England; the fathers and mothers of the children in the school, it was reported, earnestly desired that their children should continue to be taught the religion they themselves professed by the master and mistress of the school, to whom they were attached, and the ratepayers, it was stated, were of the same opinion. Nevertheless, as his correspondent, a gentleman who held a very high official position and who was incapable of expressing anything but a sound opinion upon the education question, who drew his attention to these facts pointed out, the schoolmaster must resign his office or give the children no more of that instruction which they had been accustomed to receive. He thought many other cases might be found of a similar character. His correspondent informed him that he and others had satisfied themselves as to the facts of this case.

AN HON. MEMBER: What is the number of the inhabitants?

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he really could not give them, but he did not see what numerical considerations had to do with the matter.

AN HON. MEMBER: Will the hon. Baronet give the name?

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he was perfectly prepared to hand the letter he had received to the Parliamentary Secretary.

AN HON. MEMBER wished to know whether these parishioners were tenants of the hon. Baronet's correspondent.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he thought he might answer that with a most decided negative. What were those interested to do in such a case? Were they to take refuge in the cold comfort of Clause 3? What did Clause 3 give them? They lost the teacher; they might have their religious teaching out of school hours. Religious teaching out of school hours was really no concession at all, because the children might be summoned by anybody at any time out of school hours to receive any form of religious teaching which they were willing to receive. What was desired, however, was religious instruction by the teacher to whom they were accustomed. In a town no doubt it might be possible to replace the teacher, but it was not so easy in the country. He would like to ask what would be the effect of this change in the rural areas. Hon. Members opposite were anxious to bring the people back to the land. What were they doing to encourage that idea? What were they doing with regard to the intellectual life of the village? Was not that to be found in the parson and the teacher? They were turning the parson out of the school up to the moment that they turned the teacher out of the school in order that someone else should give religious instruction. He ventured to think they would find henceforth greater trouble in getting good teachers for the schools than they did at present. The tendency of the good teachers to go to the towns would be more markedly developed when the clergyman of the parish was turned out of the schools and the common interest which both parson and teacher had taken in the welfare of the school was destroyed: he feared that the teaching would suffer in consequence, not only the religious teaching, but the teaching allround. These facilities, if they meant anything, meant a great deal, and the people who asked for them regarded them as an important factor in education, in the religious as well as the intellectual life of their children. The interest of the parent in the religious life of his child did not depend on the fact that he lived in a rural or an urban area or on the fact that he was one of a population of 5,000 or that he was one of the four-fifths majority. There was no religious difficulty in the schools. The only religious difficulty that he had heard of recently was the case of a Nonconformist child, the only one in the school, whose father complained that he was not taken to church with the rest of the children on Ascension Day. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were not in the least aware of the feeling they were creating in the rural areas by this Bill. He had had frequent communications, not from large urban centres, but from small rural areas all over the country which forced upon him the conviction that there was a deep-seated indignation at the wanton change the right hon. Gentleman's Bill would bring about in the educational condition of the parishes. He thought before long the Government would realise that their policy was not merely resented by Churchmen in great urban centres; that it was not merely a question for great political meetings, but that it had caused a widespread and deep-seated animosity in every quarter throughout the land.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley) said the Amendment before the Committee was intended to secure that in the voluntarily transferred schools there should be the same right to religious instruction as was to be given under the four-fifths provision. But the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University had made no reference in his speech to the great grievance of the Nonconformists, namely, that in 8,000 parishes throughout the country there was only one elementary day school, and that a church school; that into that school the children of the Nonconformists were compelled by law to go for their education, and that they had had hitherto only the safeguard of the conscience clause which was practically no safeguard at all. That was a very great grievance to the Nonconformists, and they were determined that in these 8,000 schools, carried on entirely at the public expense, there should not be longer continued instruction in the religious doctrines of one Church only. That involved a gross violation of the principles of religious liberty and equality of the Nonconformists of this country. The question of religious equality was thus forced upon them by this Amendment. There could be no question that in the areas to which these schools belonged, the giving to the children definite Church of England religious training only on two days a week meant that the Nonconformists suffered an injustice if they did not under this clause claim in these schools to be put on an equality with the Church, and to give their children also definite religious teaching. It was true that in some of the populous rural districts some Members of the House might desire a change. There was a great deal to be said in favour of the four-fifths provision in populous rural districts where there was a good choice of schools. He had such an area in the division he represented, and it was only right that he should claim for that district the same facilities as were given to the urban districts. But in that district there were five schools, two county, two church, and one Roman Catholic school. Personally he would desire that these schools should be treated in the same way as similar schools in urban districts. But there was a very great gulf between such school districts and the 8,000 single school areas.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) thought the hon. Member for Barnsley had gone a little wide of the argument. It was desirable that they should have figures, and the hon. Gentleman had mentioned 8,000, but he did not think he would find that number in any Parliamentary Return. He must also remind the hon. Gentleman that with reference to Clause 3, when the noble Lord beside him endeavoured to give to every Nonconformist denomination the privilege of having their doctrines taught in the single school districts, the Liberal Party voted down the Amendment to prevent the very facilities for which the hon. Gentleman was pleading so arduously just now. No argument had yet been adduced to show why an urban area with a population of 5,000 should be adopted as a standard of conscience with reference to the religious tenets of the children. No feature in this Bill was more resented than this one. The hon. Member for Barnsley had repeated that this was a question of a great grievance in connection with single school districts. It was nothing of the sort. It did not apply to single school districts at all. The argument of those on the Opposition side was that the test should not be that of population, but that it should depend on a reasonable demand for facilities. The arbitrary distinction of population could not possibly be allowed to stand. He hoped that when the question was put they might at all events have the last word reserved so that they would be able to insert "urban or rural," for if they were not allowed to go below 5,000 it should include the rural areas with a population of 5,000 and over. He was sure the wit of man, and he was quite sure the wit of the Government, could not devise any reason why a population of 5,000 in a rural area should be in any sense different from a population of the same size in an urban area. He hoped, therefore, the Government would reconsider this point.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said the hon. Member for Barnsley had laid stress upon the fact that Nonconformists felt it to be a strong grievance that in 8,000 parishes there was only a single school for the district. So far as the Roman Catholics were concerned they had not a word to say in favour of one school with one religious atmosphere for the children of different denominations, and they were willing to support any proposal which would safeguard the right of the Nonconformist child in a single school district. But that was not the point of the Amendment. It was an essential condition of getting additional facilities for the four-fifths school that there should be more than one school. Roman Catholics would not raise any objection whatever to its being made as clear as words could make it that, where there was a single school district, there could not and there should not be, any privilege enabling one denomination to have complete religious control of the school. They had been waiting for the answer of the Government to their case. The Catholics stated on the authority of the Government returns that under this provision 240 of their schools would be excluded. They also contended that under the four-fifths limitation another 200 would be excluded, and this meant that about 50 per cent. of the Catholic schools would be excluded from the national system of the country.

MR. BIRRELL dissented.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said the calculation he had made was based upon the right hon. Gentleman's own figures. The official Return put the number of schools which would be above the 5,000 limit at 77 per cent., therefore about 23 per cent. would be excluded. The answer given by the Secretary to the Board of Education was that although it was true that only 77 per cent. of the schools were included, the percentage of scholars included was 91 per cent. Now what was the reason for that disparity? The reason was that the schools in the small communities excluded by the 5,000 limit were small with a small number of scholars, whereas the schools in the urban districts were large. It was no answer to say that because the children were protected in the urban districts they should not be protected in the rural districts. They had just heard a remarkable speech from the hon. Member for the Leek Division of Staffordshire, who had pointed out that in his constituency there were two Catholic schools which had belonged to the Catholics since the Reformation. Up and down Lancashire there were little spots where they had maintained the Catholic Creed all through the Reformation down to the present day. Was it not too cruel that a little Catholic community having a Catholic school attended by Catholic children, in which the attendance was not four Catholics to one Protestant, should be deprived of facilities which the Minister for Education had declared openly that he desired to give, and this in a Catholic school which dated from pre-Reformation times? The Minister for Education had said that he wanted Clause 4 to be a reality and not a fraud or delusion, and that the reason he opposed the mandatory Amendment was because he believed that the procedure he proposed would better carry out the objects desired. When they found that 25 per cent. of the Catholic schools were excluded by this limitation, what became of the right hon. Gentleman's desire to make the clause a reality? His information from the heads of the Catholic Church was that the four-fifths limitation would exclude 25 per cent. of their schools. If 25 per cent. of the Catholic schools were excluded by one provision and 50 per cent. by another from the benefits of Clause 4, what was the good of the passionate hopes and desires of the right hon. Gentleman? So far as they were concerned, any Amendment which would save the single school district they were ready to welcome and support.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON: There are already twenty-nine Amendments down to Sub-section (b).

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said that he was in favour of any Amendment which would secure protection for the children in the rural districts. This was a real grievance of the Catholics, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see that the benefits which he meant to give them under Clause 4 were not destroyed.

MR. BIRRELL said he had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for the Scotland Division and of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford with perfect sympathy. It was to him a matter of great personal regret that any school of the character described should be excluded from the four-fifths clause. Speaking generally, he could wish that all the Roman Catholic schools were in a position to come within the limit of the clause. It was to him some satisfaction, at all events, to find that Clause 4, which had not been procured without difficulty, did not stand where it did without representing a good deal of difficulty, and he might even say of obstinacy and endurance. He was glad to think that this clause of theirs did secure very remarkable, though, he agreed, not entirely satisfactory, results. It had been already mentioned by his hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary that 819 Roman Catholic schools were in urban areas with a population of 5,000 and over, representing 77·1 per cent. of the total number of Catholic schools and 91 per cent. of the children in attendance in Catholic schools. That could not be said to be nothing.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I did not say so.

MR. BIRRELL said it was an achievement, although he wished for a larger achievement. At all events, it was not to be spoken of as if they had not accomplished something for the object which hon. Gentlemen opposite had at heart. He could not agree that a large number of the four-fifths schools within these areas would be deprived of the benefit of this clause because of the attendance at them of Protestant children. Nothing had surprised him more during his short tenure of office than to know how many Protestant children were in the habit of attending Roman Catholic schools. He thought the hon. Member for East Mayo gave one of the real reasons when he said it was due to the anxiety of parents to secure for their children the kindly teaching they often received at the hands of nuns. The hon. Member had also suggested that these good ladies had faculties for dealing with froward and troublesome children with more care and patience than the ordinary teacher was, perhaps, able to bestow. He had made some inquiry into the reasons which prompted Protestant parents to send their children to Roman Catholic schools, and he had not discovered that any religious results in the sense of inducing the children to become members of the Roman Catholic Church followed. He was very much astonished the other day to see inscribed in Roman Catholic books of devotion, signed by a Roman Catholic Bishop as prizes for religious knowledge, the names of children whom he knew to be Wesleyans and actually attending Wesleyan churches and Sunday schools, but who nevertheless went to Roman Catholic schools and exhibited such success and skill in mastering Roman Catholic theology that the Bishop inscribed their names in books of Roman Catholic devotion. That showed him that a large number of children did go to Roman Catholic schools without any intention of becoming converts, and for the sake of the training they received there. He imagined that those parents who sent their children deliberately to Roman Catholic schools because they were satisfied with them would certainly support those schools in their applications for extended facilities under this clause. They would desire the schools to go on as they had done in order that they might secure the teachers in whom they had confidence, and he had no doubt whatever that, although in no sense Roman Catholics themselves, they would, for the purpose of securing the four-fifths facilities, vote with the orthodox Roman Catholic. That was why he could not suppose for a moment that it was true that only one-half of the Roman Catholic schools in the country would receive the benefit of the clause. That some would be excluded he had to admit would be the case, and all he could say was that the clause was an artificially constructed clause. Nobody could deny that for a moment. It sought to secure the largest amount of benefit with the smallest amount of danger. It was asked why the difference was made between an urban and a rural area. It did represent a real and broad distinction, the distinction between the country atmosphere and the town atmosphere, and the Government thought they had arrived at the best possible way of distinguishing between the two areas. If rural areas were included in the benefits of subsection (b), which made it necessary that there should be suitable public school accommodation close at hand, this would give rise to difficult questions. How far off was a country school to be? In the country districts a child was often expected to walk two or two and a half miles. The hardship of that clearly depended on the character of the country and the nature of the roads. He had a case to decide lately as to the continuance of a school in Bedfordshire, where, a village being angry at a proposal to stop their school, an appeal was made to him, and he had to take into consideration the character of the road along which the children would have to travel to another school. It was a high, exposed, bitter, bleak, clay road, which in the months of November and December was a terribly hard road for children to travel along. That was the sort of question arising all over the country when one was dealing with a rural area. Hard cases made bad law, according to the legal maxim. They had to make rules which might be called arbitrary or unreasonable, but they must draw a real distinction between the conditions of town and country life. Without defending the distinction drawn as in any sense a complete and final answer, the Government were bound to make this distinction between town and country, and they had not been able to discover any better way than by limiting these schools to urban areas and defining rural areas as areas with a population of 5,000.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that this very important Amendment was being discussed under various disadvantages. One of the disadvantages of the discussion had been that the Minister for Education, being human, had to dine like the rest of them, and had not had the great advantage of hearing the Parliamentary Secretary and some of the speeches made from his own side in support of his own proposals. The hon. Member for Barnsley had probably by this time discovered that he was really arguing in favour of the Amendment and against something which was not the Amendment at all. He had also probably impressed upon the Government in private what he had forcibly impressed upon the Committee that there was a district in his constituency excluded from all the advantages of Clause 4. It was to be feared he was going to be disappointed; that he was going to be thrown over and that the too severe Minister for Education, faithfully followed by his cohorts on that side of the House, was going to sacrifice Barnsley. He sympathised with Barnsley; but it would be unfair not to give a similar word of condolence to Leek, for the other Gentleman who got up to speak for the Government—the hon. Member for Leek—had explained that there were two small Roman Catholic schools in his constituency which under the Bill of the Government would be entirely sacrificed; and, ardent as he was in opposing the Amendment, anxious as he was to support the Government, he earnestly pleaded for some mercy for the schools going to be sacrificed. His sympathy with Barnsley he extended in the same whole-hearted manner to Leek. Really it was peculiarly unfortunate that the only two Gentlemen who had supported the Government should have been obliged to explain how much the measure of the Government would injure their own constituencies. He did not know whether they were fair samples of the generous support which the Government at present seemed to anticipate. If he came to the independent supporters of the Government, and to the argument they had advanced against his hon. friend, and if he came to the Government themselves and their own account of the reasons which had induced them to make this exception in favour of urban areas, there were two speeches to be considered—the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary and the speech just delivered. The speech of the Parliamentary Secretary was an interesting one, and gave many statistics in a form not usually very clear; but he really gave them only two arguments for the differentiation between urban and rural districts. The first was one held in common with the Minister for Education, but the other, which for some reason that Minister did not repeat, was that the ballot was an instrument suited to the intelligence of the urban district but that the stupid rural parent could not be asked to vote by ballot as to the kind of education he desired his child to have. That was not very complimentary to the rural parent, and it seemed rather like a serious indictment of the Ballot Act, but it was wholly unfounded. He suggested that there should be no ballot at all if that was too delicate an instrument for rural districts. A more serious argument was advanced by the Minister for Education. He, throwing over the Member for Barnsley, admitted that the Amendment did not touch areas where there was no alternative school, but only where there was such a school, but he said how difficult it was to determine in the country whether there was or was not an alternative school, that the macadam in the road had to be considered, whether the pathway was wet, how many stiles had to be crossed, and all the other difficulties incident to rural locomotion. Without arguing upon these difficulties, he asked did not similar difficulties arise in regard to urban districts? Responsible educational authorities had made tremendous fuss over the fact that to get to a certain school children had to cross a big, much-frequented thoroughfare, and there were other obstacles. So that in town as in country it was not merely a question of distance, and if a distinction was to be founded on the difficulty in finding an alternative school there were similar difficulties in towns. If then there was no distinction between town and country, what arguments were left for the Government? There was no distinction, and he thought it was perfectly obvious from the speeches made and from the clause that the sole reason why the Government had introduced this arbitrary division between areas in both of which were alternative schools was that only by drawing such a distinction could they do a good deal for the Church of Rome—only by drawing such a distinction could they do great injury to the Church of England. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that 25 per cent. of the Roman Catholic schools would be excluded by this clause, but he explained that the clause was so ingeniously drawn that only 9 per cent. of their children would be excluded. Why was that an achievement? The only possible explanation of its being an achievement was that the Government had contrived to find a line which would include most of the Roman Catholic children and exclude an enormous number of Church of England children. There were many rural areas where there were alternative schools, where four-fifths of the children belonged to the Established Church, where the Church had built and had maintained the schools. On what principle were they to be excluded? The only possible answer was that the Government deliberately intended this Bill to be a blow at the Church denominational schools, and the only limitation which they had put on themselves, or which had been placed upon them, in the degree to which they meant to injure the Church schools was the fact that if they went beyond a certain point the injury to the Roman Catholic schools would be intolerable. They had an opportunity of adopting the principle, which even if adopted would inflict great hardship on Church schools in single-school areas, that wherever there was an alternative school and wherever there was a desire on the part of the majority of those attending the school to have denominational religion that desire should be satisfied. That principle was plain, intelligible, and easily acceptable. Why did not the Government accept it? If Members opposite did sincerely desire, and he knew many of them did, that there should not be in the face of the Bill any provisions clearly and obviously aimed at the Established Church, if they really did desire that there should be no bitterness inflicted on the Members of that Church, was not this the least they could give? They could not pretend that it was unjust or that any Nonconformist child or parent was injured, and yet, while they redressed no grievance of those whom they were bound, he admitted, to represent in this House, why should they gratuitously inflict upon the members of one Church an injury which they were anxious to avoid with regard to members of the other Church, and which they were only prevented from avoiding wholly by the fact that they could not give everything which the Roman Catholics asked for without giving a great deal to the Church of England? It was quite true that only 9 per cent. of the Catholic children were injured by this clause as it stood, and that, therefore, by the Amendment they would only benefit 9 per cent. of the Catholic children. But it was also true that the absolute number of Church of England children and parents who would be benefited was far greater, and was it really to be argued that, while they agreed that there was a grievance on the part of the Roman Catholics, the Government refused to redress it for fear that in doing so they would do a similar act of justice to the Church of England? The matter would not bear argument for a moment. It was persecution, and gratuitous persecution. No principle that had ever been proclaimed on any Nonconformist platform would be violated by the granting of this concession. No mandate that any human being had ever pretended was given at the last election would be violated. There could only be one motive for refusing it, and that motive was to injure the Church of which so many of the opponents of the Government were members.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

And, it being after Eleven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

CORK CITY RAILWAYS AND WORKS BILL [BY ORDER].

Order for Third Reading read (King's consent signified.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.), in moving the rejection of the Bill, said the House of Commons was being asked by this railway company to allow them to evade the Parliamentary obligations which they undertook in 1898. Under the Bill the counties concerned were being asked to contribute £25,000 out of the public funds for the purpose of completing the link line which the railway company solemnly undertook to build with their own money. The county of Waterford, a part of which he had the honour of representing, had a strong moral claim that the fund out of which this money had been promised should be devoted to purposes for the benefit of the county. Waterford in the past undertook an enormously heavy guarantee for the building of this railway, and it was afterwards found that the line could not be completed for the £280,000 which was the full extent of the capital raised by the company, and consequently an application was made for a loan to enable them to complete the line, and they obtained a loan of £93,000. The county ratepayers were not consenting parties to the arrangement, but they got, in consideration of their guarantee of £14,000 a year, a right to the surplus profits of the company in excess of the 5 per cent. interest on the £280,000 share capital. Just at the time when it seemed likely that the county ratepayers might be recouped for the enormous amount they found for maintaining the railway an arrangement for the purchase of the line under an agreement with two other railway companies was made. When the through route was completed the ratepayers expected some recoupment of the large advances they had made during all those years, but nevertheless they consented to forego their claim to be recouped the £292,000 they had paid, which had been increased to £350,000, in consideration of those companies building a direct line from Cork to Fermoy, and the ratepayers got a remission of half the £14,000 a year, but were still liable for £7,000 a year. Parliament was now being asked to allocate some of this money for the benefit of people who had never spent a penny upon the undertaking. He heartily approved of the works that were to be done under the Bill, but these railway companies, having come under obligations to Parliament, should be asked by Parliament to discharge them. There was no excuse for them whatever. Hon. Members on that side of the House who were supporting the Bill were guilty of complicity in helping the companies to evade their Parliamentary obligations. A large proportion of the ratepayers of the county of Cork were not in favour of the allocation of the money which would be made if the scheme in the Bill were carried out, for they had hoped that it would be devoted to the making of the Cork and Fermoy direct line. They were not in favour of an allocation of the money which would relieve these railway companies of their obligations. In his own experience of Parliament he had never known such a flagrant evasion of Parliamentary obligations. The Committee who considered the Bill were not to blame for passing it, because they had not before them all the evidence which could be brought forward against it. The question which the House had to decide was whether the Treasury was to be allowed to give £25,000 to enable the railway companies to evade their obligations. He did not see why the House should help them with public funds to get out of their undertakings. Parliament should treat with scant ceremony any Bill promoted by these companies until they had carried out the obligations they had already undertaken in the matter. He begged to move.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.), in seconding said he had all along thought that the case against the Bill was unanswerable. The Treasury was now going to do what on two previous occasions it had refused to do, namely, to assist two great companies to evade their statutory obligations. In corroboration of the views laid before the House, he would read an extract from a speech delivered by the Chairman of the hybrid Committee who considered this matter some years ago. Speaking in this House on July 23rd, 1901, with reference to the construction of the Cork and Fermoy Railway, Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth, now Lord Shuttleworth, said :

> "Before he sat down he would refer to the idea mooted by the company, that they would offer an alternative to the construction of this railway. But what did they offer? They offered as an alternative to carry out a second obligation—one of many, but a second obligation which they equally solemnly undertook, namely, with the co-operation of the City of Cork, to connect this new system with that particular district for the benefit of the fishing and agricultural industries. He hoped the House of Commons and the Government would not for a moment entertain the idea that, because the company offered to carry out one of their obligations, they therefore, should be let off carrying out the other."

That was the view of a Gentleman who had studied the matter well. The Bill would probably get through its various stages, and he wished to know whether it would be competent for the Treasury to put an estimate on the Paper during the autumn session for the money which the company was to receive, or whether it must be deferred until next year, when they would have further opportunity of discussing the matter and of showing the scandalous way in which the railway companies had acted.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and to add the words 'upon this day three months'."—(Mr. O'Shee.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.) said he hoped the hon. Member for West Waterford would excuse him if he did not answer him in detail. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that this subject had been fully debated at various stages, and that after every argument that could be used had been heard the House was in favour of the Bill by 196 votes to 27 against. After such a crushing defeat he should have thought that the hon. Member would not have had the courage to discuss the case again. He would have ample opportunity of discussing the whole question when the £25,000 was put on the Estimates next year. He trusted that the Bill would now be read a third time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read the third time, and passed.

WIRRAL RAILWAY (EXTENSION OF TIME) BILL [LORDS].

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [24th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Which Amendment was—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months'."—(Mr. William Lever.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. W. H. LEVER (Cheshire, Wirral) said he wished to withdraw the Amendment which he had previously moved, that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read a second time, and committed.

MR. W. H. LEVER said he wished to move the following Resolution: "That it be an instruction to the Committee that they shall provide that the Wirral Railway Company shall not run any omnibus in any city, borough, or other urban district provided with a system of tramways or omnibuses except with the consent of the local authority or local authorities, as the case may be, working such tramways or omnibuses." He did so in order that this House might have an opportunity of settling a most important principle. Before the ratepayers' money, amounting to £135,000, was allowed to be invested in these tramways, a most exhaustive inquiry was held, not only as to the advantage the expenditure would give to the public, but also to see whether the ratepayers' money was invested on sound lines. Therefore it seemed a remarkable thing that now a railway company should come forward with a Bill which would enable them to run motor omnibuses in direct conflict with this system of municipal tramways. It was not that objection was taken to any additional means of locomotion being provided to the ratepayers; it was the competition from railway companies—competition which was never intended that the municipalities should have to face at the time when they were permitted by the House of Commons to invest the money of the ratepayers in tramways. If the railway company were allowed to use the roads in the municipality to the cost and repair of which they paid nothing, it would be a most unfair mode of competition. The Bill contained a clause in which the railway company declared that they only sought power to take up and set down passengers from their railway stations. That, he thought, was a fallacious clause, the only object of the promoters in inserting it being to recognise the strength of the opposition and the justice of the claims of the municipality. The object of the railway company would be better served by the insertion of the Instruction which stood in his name and which he begged to move.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland) Seconded the Motion. He thought that to grant this concession to the railway company would be most unfair to the municipal tramways undertaking in the district. The Company had sent a circular to Members of the House in which they stated that the use of these 'buses would be limited to bona fide passengers on their railway. It was however in his judgment impossible to ascertain whether people were bona fide passengers or not. The municipality must pay off within thirty-five years the capital advanced to them to start their undertaking and he did not think a railway company should be allowed to set up a system of motor omnibuses in competition with the tramway authorities.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they shall provide that the Wirral Railway Company shall not run any omnibus in any city, borough, or other urban district provided with a system of tramways or omnibuses except with the consent of the local authority or local authorities, as the case may be, working such tramways or omnibuses."—(Mr. W. H. Lever.)

MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) rose to move as an Amendment to the Instruction proposed—

"In line 6, after the word 'omnibus,' to insert the words, 'but that if such consent shall be unreasonably withheld the matter shall be determined by the Board of Trade, whose decision shall be final and binding.'"

MR. SUMMERBELL asked as a point of order whether, in face of the provision in the Bill, paragraph E, page 6, giving an appeal to the Board of Trade, the Amendment could be put.

*MR. SPEAKER said it was some what hard to say on the spur of the moment whether the question of unreasonably withholding consent was or was not a matter in regard to which the Company might consider themselves aggrieved within this section. He did not think, however, that any harm would result if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Crewe were accepted. It might be incorporated in the Bill without any contradiction of its other provisions.

*MR. TOMKINSON moved his Amendment, and said he thought it right at the outset to say that he was a director of the railway in question, and therefore might be regarded with suspicion. He did not think that prevented him, however, from stating the case as fairly as possible, although he might say that he had no intention of voting if the question went to a division. It would be seen that there was only a small point of difference between the railway company and those whom his hon. friend represented. There were, however, certain circumstances with which he thought the House ought to be acquainted. The Wirral Railway was a small one consisting of only twelve miles of line, although it was in a populous district. It connected the watering places of West Kirby and New Brighton with Wallasey and other places, and was also connected with the Mersey Railway. About ten years ago, at the instance of this very urban council, and in order to serve their district, the Wirral Railway Company made a fresh line of two or three miles from Seacombe Ferry to the great advantage of the district. In the present year this authority promoted a Bill, and brought it before a very strong Committee of the House of Lords, which also dealt with this Bill, of which Lord Cawdor was Chairman. The Bill of the Wirral Company was heard first, and a decision postponed until the whole of the circumstances with regard to both Bills had been thrashed out. After hearing the case of the Wallasey Urban Council, who wished to take powers to run a tramway practically alongside this very railway and thus deprive them of their passengers, the Committee threw out the Bill of the Wallasey District Council and passed the Wirral Railway Bill. The Wirral Railway Company only asked that their Bill should be passed, and they were quite willing to accept this Instruction if there was an appeal to the Board of Trade. He thought under the circumstances there was a reason for the company asking for such an appeal. His hon. friend the Member for Birkenhead had said—"Why do you not go into the country instead of coming to this urban district where there are no tramways and get passengers?" He remembered, however, that a fortnight ago the hon. Gentleman himself denounced motor 'buses running in these rural districts and injuring the farmers. They all knew, however, that the rural authorities objected to the use of their roads for this purpose, although their people used the roads in the towns. In view of the fact that the railways were rated up to the hilt and that the incidence of the rates fell heavily upon them, he thought the present opposition to the Bill was neither fair nor reasonable.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) seconded the Amendment. Being intimately acquainted with Liverpool he would endeavour to put the position clearly before the House. The hon. Member for the Wirrall Division, in proposing his Motion, had disclaimed any objection to improved locomotion, but said that what he objected to was competition. It was not the interest of railway companies or municipalities which ought to be considered in cases of this kind, but the interest of the public. In this particular case the municipality had obtained power to compete with the railway; why, therefore, should not the railway compete in the interest of the public? The Motion was not really honest, because it was certain that it would prevent the railway company running motor 'buses to their own stations without the consent of the municipality, and that consent would never be given. The only proposal of the Amendment was to leave the question to be decided by the Board of Trade.

Amendment proposed—

"At the end of the proposed Amendment, to add the words 'but that if such consent shall be unreasonably withheld the matter shall be determined by the Board of Trade, whose decision shall be final and binding.'"—(Mr. Tomkinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said this was a matter of principle upon which a representative of the Board of Trade ought to be heard, and as there was no representative of that Department present he moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That the debate be now adjourned" put, and negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Lever and Mr. Summerbell.

Main Question again proposed.

LORD R. CECIL called attention to the position in which the House was left upon this question. He thought they had a right to demand the advice of the responsible advisers of His Majesty's Government in regard to railways, and he thought they would do well not to proceed to a final decision until that advice had been given. In order to give the House an opportunity of obtaining that advice he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Lord R. Cecil.)

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER expressed his surprise that nothing had been said from the Government Benches upon this Bill. He reminded hon. Members that similar powers to those which had just been refused to this company had been given to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, and now, at the dictation of a particular section of the House there had just been a refusal of what had already been given to another company.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does this question arise on the Motion for the adjournment?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is giving reasons why the matter should be adjourned.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER thought the position taken up by the House on this matter was a most improper one. He was not opposed to municipal undertakings, but in this particular case the hon. Member for Wirral had stated that the rural districts ought to have these facilities. He thought they were now carrying the principle of municipalisation too far, and the House had already given municipalities far too much.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now arguing against the Bill. The question is that the debate be adjourned.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER appealed to the Board of Trade to give the House some reason why they had not given the House some direction in this matter.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District), on a point of order, pointed out that it was already laid down in the Bill that there was to be no appeal to the Board of Trade, and under those circumstances he wished to know if there was any rule which necessitated the presence of the President of the Board of Trade or any other representative of that Department?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER thought the House ought to be told why a difference was made between one railway company and another in the granting of these facilities.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. GEORGE WHITELEY, Yorkshire, W.R., Pudsey) said it was very desirable that the House should come to a decision upon this matter now. He regretted the absence of any representative of the Board of Trade, but there were a large number of hon. Members present who were quite as able to deal with these matters as the Board of Trade, and it would only be penalising the company to adjourn the debate.

MR. FORSTER (Kent, Sevenoaks) said the question which had been brought before the House was whether or not on occasions like this when large questions of principle were raised, with which the Board of Trade were intimately associated, a representative of the Board of Trade ought or ought not to be present in order to give to the House the benefit of his guidance. In days not long ago when some hon. Members opposite were in Opposition, whenever they discovered the absence of any representative of a Government department they never lost the opportunity of moving the adjournment of the debate, or of taking advantage of any other opportunity of calling attention to what they called a grave dereliction of duty on the part of the Government. They were now concerned with a large question of principle. They were entitled to receive the opinion and guidance of the responsible Minister concerned, and seeing that there was no representative of the Board of Trade in the House, he thought they might very well agree to the motion for the adjournment.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said that it was by the initiative of His Majesty's advisers that these private Bills had been brought up at a time when most hon. Members opposite would like to be in bed. He did not think that any private Bill ought to be dealt with after midnight, and without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the case he protested against dealing with private legislation in the absence of the responsible Minister who was paid to be present and attend to this business.

Mr. TOMKINSON said that although he deprecated the carrying of this Instruction he hoped the House would allow the Bill to be proceeded with.

Lord TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham) said hon. Members opposite had quite misinterpreted their action in moving the adjournment of the debate. They had not taken this course in regard to this particular Bill, but in order to call attention to the absence of any representative of the Board of Trade when an important principle was being discussed. He thought the argument of the Patronage Secretary that the Bill could be discussed as well in the absence of the representatives of the Board of Trade was an extraordinary one. He appealed to the House to support the Motion for the adjournment.

*Mr. SHACKLETON said he did not rise for the purpose of obstructing the Bill. The question raised was an important one, namely, the absence of a representative of the Board of Trade. He was going to support the Motion on that ground alone. In the last Parliament when a Unionist Government was in office he had supported similar Resolutions on the ground of the absence of the Minister in charge. This was an important matter, and they were entitled to the opinion of the Board of Trade upon it. He earnestly urged those who were responsible for the Bill to accept the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, in order that an opportunity might be given for ascertaining the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade upon the matter. If the Bill did not go through to-night, the fault would lie with the representatives of the Board of Trade who were not present to answer the reasonable questions which had been raised.

Mr. W. H. LEVER appealed to hon. Members opposite to allow the Bill to go through to-night. The Bill would go to a Committee upstairs, and he thought the expression of opinion which had taken place as to the absence of the representatives of the Board of Trade would be just as effective as if they were to penalise the measure. The Bill was of importance to the district concerned, and if it was not allowed to go through to-night the fixing of another date for debating the Motion might mean that it could not be passed this session.

Colonel LOCKWOOD said he was in favour of the Bill and wished to see it passed, but he thought a representative of the Board of Trade should be present to answer questions. The Patronage Secretary was to blame for this. He was paid a handsome salary to see that Ministers were in their places when they were wanted. It was on account of their absence that the adjournment of the debate had been moved.

MR. VIVIAN (Birkenhead) appealed to hon. Members opposite to allow the Bill to go through to-night. Important commercial interests were at stake, and the Bill had been discussed on more than one occasion. It was not fair to the company to hang up its interests because of some failure on the part of the Board of Trade to have representatives present.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said the adjournment of the debate would not in any way injure the company, or hinder the progress of the Bill. The adjournment of the debate would only delay the discussion of the Instruction for one night. To-morrow night the House would get the opinion of the Board of Trade as to whether it was advisable to give such an Instruction to the Committee.

MR. W. H. LEVER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Watson Rutherford and Mr. Mitchell-Thomson.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill, that they shall provide that the Wirral Railway Company shall not run any omnibus in any city, borough, or other urban district provided with a system of tramways or omnibuses except with the consent of the local authority or local authorities, as the case may be, working such tramways or omnibuses.—(Mr. William Lever.)

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT BILL.

Order for the House to be again put into Committee read.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said that before any hon. Member objected he should like to make a statement. The hon. Member for Loughboro' had asked him to put in a proviso excluding perforated music from the operation of the Bill, and he had consented to do so. He had also consented that if the House would give him that stage that night to give further consideration to any suggested Amendments.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid.) in the Chair.

Clause 1:—

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) moved an Amendment standing in the name of the Home Secretary.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 6, to leave out the word 'music' and insert the words 'copies of any musical work, or has in his possession any plates for the purpose of printing or reproducing pirated copies of any musical work'."—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'music' stand part of the clause."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said he accepted the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'copies of any musical work, or has in his possession any plates for the purpose of printing or reproducing pirated copies of any musical work' be there inserted."

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) thought the Bill ought to be discussed. The matter was of considerable importance, and he did not understand why it should be passed through without debate.

SIR FREDERICK BANBURY asked whether it was in order for an hon. Member to make a speech at this period of the evening.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL appealed to the hon. Member to allow the Bill to proceed. The Government were very anxious that it should pass with necessary Amendments.

*Mr. LUPTON said he thought the Bill was a highly discreditable one for the Government to pass.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said the Amendment he had accepted was purely of a verbal character and the hon. Gentleman's point could be raised on the next Amendment when he would endeavour to meet him.

*Mr. LUPTON said he was perfectly willing to meet the hon. Gentleman and discuss the measure with him, but he had already made one or two suggestions with which the hon. Gentleman had not agreed. He was anxious to defend the rights of all, the music publisher, the composer, the public, and the agents.

Mr. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) appealed to the hon. Member to let the Bill go through this stage.

*Mr. LUPTON said if the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill wanted him to withdraw his opposition he would meet him and discuss the matter and try and make the Bill one that would be a credit to the House.

*The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member object to its proceeding or not?

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR objected most strongly to such a Question being put from the Chair.

*The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said it was a perfectly proper Question to ask and was a question frequently asked by Mr. Speaker. If there was any objection, discussion must end.

*Mr. LUPTON stated that he did object to proceeding with the Bill, and that he had said so at the opening of his remarks and all along.

And, it being after Eleven of the clock on Tuesday evening, and objection being taken to further proceeding, the Deputy-Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

On Mr. Speaker taking the Chair—

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said he wished to call attention to a question of order which had just arisen. An hon. Member opposite was suggesting some reason why the Bill under discussion should be more carefully considered, and he (Mr. O'Connor) was prepared to answer the hon. Member when the hon. Gentleman occupying the Chair for the moment on his own initiative asked the hon. Member whether he objected to the progress of the Bill or not, practically putting the suggestion into the mouth of the hon. Member.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) asked, before Mr. Speaker replied, whether it was in order for the Chairman to leave the Chair without progress being reported.

*Mr. SPEAKER said he was not a Court of Appeal from either the Chairman or Deputy-Chairman of Committees. He was quite sure the Deputy-Chairman acted impartially when in the Chair. What he understood the proper practice to be was that after eleven o'clock opposed business could not be taken. The Question was, was the Bill opposed or not. If an hon. Member said he opposed, the Bill could not proceed. He believed he had been guilty himself of putting the Question, "Do you object?"

Committee report Progress. To sit again this day.

INCLOSURES (COUNTY OF CUMBERLAND).

Return ordered, "showing (1) the number of Inclosures of common land made under the Inclosures Acts from 1845 to 1899 in the County of Cumberland; (2) list of parishes within which such lands are wholly or partly situate; (3) total acreage of such Inclosures; (4) average acreage of such Inclosures."—(Mr. Fullerton.)

And, it being after half-past Eleven of the clock on Tuesday evening, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at three minutes after One o'clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Poisons and Pharmacy Bill—Suggested Reference to a Select Committee.

MR. WINFREY (Norfolk, S.W.): To ask the Prime Minister whether, having regard to the fact that, in addition to the Government Poisons and Pharmacy Bill, there is in the House another Bill for amending the Pharmacy Acts, and that both Bills are objected to in their present form, he will arrange for the two Bills to be referred to a Select Committee, so that a full investigation of the subject matter of the Bills may be assured.

Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) My right hon. friend has asked me to answer this Question. I do not think there is any need to refer the two Bills to a Select Committee. The points needing detailed investigation have already been fully considered by a Departmental Committee, and the facts relating to the questions arising on Clause 4 of the Poisons and Pharmacy Bill are already fully known and do not require further investigation by a Committee.

Publication of Evidence of Committee on Accounts of Local Authorities.

MR. RADFORD (Islington, E.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will cause the Proceedings and Minutes of Evidence already taken by the Departmental Committee on the Accounts of Local Authorities to be printed and published during the Parliamentary recess; and if he will subsequently arrange that representatives of the Press be admitted to any future sittings of the Committee.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) It rests with the Committee to determine on their procedure, and I understand that they decided, at their first meeting, that it would be undesirable to publish the evidence taken by them until the conclusion of their inquiry, or to admit representatives of the Press to their meetings.

Transvaal Law Affecting Trustees and Estate Duty.

MR. GROVE (Northamptonshire, S.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that, on the death of a trustee in the Transvaal of English domicile, succession and estate duty is levied, although no change in the beneficial enjoyment of the property is involved; and whether he will take steps to bring about an alteration in the laws affecting trusts, and so remove the disabilities under which English subjects holding property in the Transvaal suffer.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I believe that it is the practice in the Transvaal to levy duty in the circumstances described by the hon. Member. I will communicate with the Governor upon the matter.

Translation into Chinese of Government Proclamations.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the differences in the dialects used at the various ports of the Chinese Empire from which coolies have been and are being recruited into South Africa, and that a proclamation in literary Chinese or any one of the various Chinese local dialects would probably be unintelligible to many of the labourers, even when such are at all able to read, he will have steps taken to insure that the intentions of the Imperial Government are clearly understood by the coolies.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Inquiry will be made as to what further steps may be necessary to ensure that the coolies understand the offer made to them.

Attacks on Jews in Russia.

MR. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he could see his way to instruct the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg to report fully as soon as possible upon the circumstances of the recent attacks on the Jews in Russia; and whether such Report could be presented to the House at an early date.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) It would not be desirable that such Reports should be published by His Majesty's Government.

British Insurance Companies and Mortgages on Irish Land.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will issue instructions and call upon all British insurance companies holding mortgages on Irish land to submit particulars as to these mortgages, the conditions, the amounts, and the rate of interest charged.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) This information is not required to be shown by the companies in their statutory Returns to the Board of Trade, and the Board have no power under the Life Assurance Companies Acts to call for it.

Protection of Life Insurance Policy Holders.

MR. FIELD: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what steps the Government intend to take respecting the action of the trustees and the governing bodies of insurance companies for the protection of their policy holders.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Life Assurance Companies Acts do not give the Board of Trade any powers with regard to the trustees or governing bodies of insurance companies, and, as at present advised, I have no intention of initiating fresh legislation for the purpose.

Brakes on Electric Cars.

MR. T. DAVIES (Fulham): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the accident which occurred to an electric tram-car near Highgate Archway on Saturday last, resulting in the death of several persons; and whether, in view of similar accidents of late to cars on steep gradients, he will consider the advisability of instituting an inquiry in order that he may, if he thinks necessary, make more stringent regulations as to brakes of cars running over very steep gradients such as this.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) An inquiry into this sad accident will be held on behalf of the Board of Trade by the chief inspecting officer of railways, and the Question to which my hon. friend draws attention will certainly receive very careful consideration.

Damage to Crops by Motor Traffic.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the President of the Local Government Board what steps he intends taking in order to abate the damage to crops and nuisance to the public resulting from motor traffic upon through roads, such as that leading from Shrewsbury to the Welsh coast.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received complaints as to the damage and nuisance caused by the dust raised by motor cars, and I have communicated them to the Royal Commission on Motor Cars for their consideration.

Water Supply for Cottages at Baily Hill, Birdbrook, Essex.

MR. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he has been able to ascertain from the Bumpstead Rural District Council whether they have exhausted their powers under The Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, in the unsuccessful attempt made by them to secure a proper supply of water for the nine cottages at Baily Hill, Birdbrook, Essex, whose sole supply at present consists of polluted pond water; and whether, if this be the case, he will consider the advisability of introducing some amendment of the law affecting rural water supplies.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received from the rural district council a copy of the Report made by the medical officer of health on this subject. I understand that there is a well within 200 yards of the cottages from which the occupiers might obtain water, but that there are certain difficulties in their using the well, and there is the quality of the water to be considered. I am still in communication with the rural district council on the matter.

Education Bill—Government Amendments to Clause 6.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University): To ask the President of the Board of Education when he will publish his Amendments to Clause 6 of the Education Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) My undertaking was that the Committee should be left perfectly free to decide whether Clause 6 should remain as in the Bill, or should be altered so as to require the attendance at the schoolhouse of every child during the time allotted to religious instruction. This will be done either upon one of the Amendments already on the Paper or upon some other Amendment which will effect the purpose.

Education Bill—Financial Proposals.

MR. RAWLINSON: To ask the President of the Board of Education when he will publish the rules for the distribution of the million pounds referred to in Clause 12 of the Education Bill, and promised by him on 12th May last.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) It was by an oversight in my office, for which I express regret, that the hope was expressed by me (it was not a promise, as the hon. Member suggests), on 10th May† that the regulations for the distribution of the £1,000,000 under Clause 12 of the Bill would be issued very shortly; it was due to an inadvertent confusion of that matter with the regulations then being drafted in respect of the other new grant for necessitous areas, which were issued a few days later. I am unable to-day to make any statement in regard to the distribution of the £1,000,000. It will necessarily be affected to a certain extent by the decision arrived at only yesterday in this House, that local authorities may, in defined circumstances, be relieved of the duty of maintaining a certain limited number of schools, and will also be precluded from taking any financial burden (which might have occurred under the Bill as introduced) in respect of certain other schools in the shape of payments for rent.

Dismissed Employees Trading in Opposition to their late Employers—Suggested Legislation.

MR. HODGE (Lancashire, Gorton): To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether his attention has been called to cases recently decided, enforcing agreements restraining canvassers and other employees from following after they have left their employment by summary dismissal or otherwise a similar calling within a wide area round large and important towns in the north of England; and whether he will consider the advisability of introducing legislation to deal with this matter.

(Answered by Sir Lawson Walton.) My attention has been called to the cases referred to. The rule of law provides that the Court shall say whether the restriction upon the further employment of a canvasser, or other agent, after the end of his service is greater than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer whose service he has left. This is, in my opinion, sound, but the application of the rule may vary in different cases; and if the decisions of the County Courts or other tribunals are unsatisfactory, there is a remedy by appeal. I do not think there is necessity for further legislation.

Donegal County Council and Army Meat Contracts.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received a resolution from the Donegal County Council protesting against the change recently made in the Army meat tender form, under which contractors can supply foreign meat killed at the port of disembarkation instead of native home-bred meat, which was guaranteed by the late Government some years ago, and also protesting against the feeding of Army horses on foreign oats, straw and hay, and calling upon the Secretary of State for War to reconsider his decisions on these subjects in the interests of the taxpayers, ratepayers and employers of the three kingdoms; what reply has he given to this resolution; and what steps, if any, does he propose to take to fulfil official promises which have been violated by the new arrangements.

† See (4) Debates, clvi., 1479.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The resolution mentioned has been received and acknowledged. It is not proposed to depart from the decisions in regard to these matters which have been already communicated to the House.

Tidworth Barracks—Scavenging Tenders.

MR. MORSE (Wilts, Wilton): To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the meaning of Clause 3 of the form of tender for scavenging, issued for 26th August, 1903, at Tidworth Barracks; is the contractor entitled to be paid the scheduled price on the basis of the number of men for the accommodation of whom the barracks were constructed, or must it be calculated on the number of men actually in the barracks.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Under the contract referred to, the contractor is entitled to receive payment on the number of men in barracks, irrespective of the number the barracks are constructed to hold. Clause 3, which formed part of the contract in force prior to 1903, was inadvertently retained in the new one. If this clause was considered binding, the first part of it would reduce the rate now payable to one-half, a result clearly unacceptable to the contractor. I may add that the schedule of the contract clearly showed that the tender was for the removal of rubbish, etc., at so much per 100 men per month.

Government Writers' Wages at Weedon.

MR. GROVE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, if it is at present necessary to make a distinction between the pay of the writers in the Government stores at Pimlico and at Weedon, though the work carried out in each locality is practically the same, he can see his way to grant an annual increment in each case, especially in view of the fact that the rents at Weedon, since 1902, have increased more than 20 per cent.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) An application for increase of pay at Weedon has been received and is under consideration.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Admiralty Flag List.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can see his way to publishing the Report of the Committee presided over by Lord Goschen in 1902, which Lord Selborne informed Parliament was to assist the Admiralty in devising a remedy for the absence from the Flag List of a due proportion of younger officers.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The question of the publication of the report of Lord Goschen's Committee has been decided on several occasions by previous Boards of Admiralty in the negative. The present Board do not intend to reverse the decision of their predecessors.

MR. BELLAIRS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Lord Selborne twice intimated to Parliament an intention to reduce the age for promotion, while he himself said yesterday it had been raised for senior officers?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I do not remember anything about Lord Selborne's statement and I did not mean to intimate that the age had been raised.

Discharges from Woolwich Arsenal.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many, if any, men it is proposed to discharge from the Arsenal, Woolwich, and why are notices being served upon men of long service who have been working three-quarter time for six months; is it possible to say when the men will resume full time again, in view of the amount taken in the Estimates for the year.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddingtonshire): It is difficult at the present moment to estimate the number of discharges which will be necessary but it is hoped that they will not exceed 320 men and boys. The least efficient men will be discharged first. In many cases with long service men there is no suitable work on which they can be employed, and their discharge is consequently unavoidable. It is not clear to which shop the latter part of the question refers, but in the shell factory there is no present prospect of resuming full time.

Fourth Battalion Worcestershire Regiment.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War on what date the 4th Battalion Worcestershire Regiment left Egypt.

MR. HALDANE: This battalion left Egypt on the 9th June.

British Central Africa—Labour Contracts.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is proposed to introduce any method of enforcing contracts for labour in British Central Africa otherwise than by a civil suit under the existing law.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The question whether magistrates shall not be given power to inflict penalties on natives for breach of contract, similar to those exercised by magistrates in some of the South African colonies, is under the consideration of the Commissioner whose recommendations will be submitted for the approval of the Secretary of State.

Canadian Emigration Bounties.

MR. HAZLETON (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will inquire from the Canadian Government how long its system of paying £1 per head to shipping agents in Ireland for emigrants to Canada has been in force; what is the total amount of money that has been expended in this way in Ireland by the Canadian Government; and whether the Canadian Government will supply information as to the names and addresses of those shipping agents in Ireland to whom it has paid any such money during the past five years.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Canadian Government will be asked for the information which the hon. Member desires to obtain.

Ceylon Pearl Fisheries.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can explain the circumstances under which the late Colonial Secretary, on December 1st, 1905, on the eve of the general election, sent to the Governor of Ceylon a Draft Ordinance, prepared by himself, sanctioning the lease of the pearl fisheries for twenty years at an annual rental of £20,666 to a London Company, and expressing the hope that the Legislative Council would pass the Ordinance; whether it is usual to exercise such pressure in a matter of purely domestic concern to the Colony and in no way of an Imperial character; why the Ordinance was not left to be prepared and published in the ordinary way by the responsible authorities in the Colony; why the words with the advice * * * of the Legislative Council were inserted in the Preamble to the Ordinance, seeing that the Legislative Council do not appear to have been asked for nor to have given advice, and, seeing that only the official Executive Council were consulted, why the lease was antedated January 1st, 1906, although the Ordinance was not passed till February 27th; and whether this antedating has resulted in the surrender of over £30,000 of Colonial revenue to the lessees; how it is that, although tenders for the concession were not invited and no official publicity was given to it, a number of persons of various nationalities interested in the Transvaal gold mines were enabled to learn of the value of the concession and to obtain shares in it.

MR. CHURCHILL: The correspondence presented to Parliament shows that the late Secretary of State forwarded a draft of the lease to the Governor on October 4th last, when he stated that the solicitors on both sides would now prepare a preliminary agreement and revise the draft lease from a legal point of view. This was done, and the documents were sent out on December 1st. The reasons for expressing the hope that the Legislative Council would pass the measure are given in the despatch itself, and the Secretary of State does not consider that any undue pressure was put on the Council. A condition of the provisional agreement was that the lease should be confirmed by a special Ordinance to be passed in the terms set out in a schedule to the agreement. The draft of the Ordinance was, therefore, necessarily prepared in this country. The words are a necessary part of any legislative enactment. It was expected that a decision would be taken before the beginning of this year's fishery, but it was understood throughout the negotiations that, if this should prove impracticable, the fishery of 1906 would be conducted by the Government on account of the syndicate. The Ceylon Government informed the Legislature on the Second Reading of the Ordinance that if it was passed, the lease would be antedated to January 1st, 1906. I may add that this arrangement enables the company to have the advantage of earlier possession of the lease, which will terminate a year earlier. The allotment of shares in the company is a matter which concerns the directors, and the Secretary of State can obviously have no information as to the advantages which enabled or the reasons which induced any particular individuals to apply for shares.

MR. SMEATON asked why was such secrecy observed throughout the negotiations down to the end of 1905; how was it that the people of the colony only ascertained that the lease was about to be granted through rumours in circulation; and why at the Third Reading of the Bill was discussion of the details of the lease not permitted?

MR. SPEAKER said notice should be given of Questions on matters of detail.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.) asked whether Sir West Ridgeway took any part in the negotiations during the term of his Governorship.

MR. CHURCHILL: I think it is unnecessary to say he took no part in the negotiations leading to this lease during the time he was Governor. More than a year elapsed between his leaving Ceylon and the granting of the lease.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said the question was—Did he utilise his knowledge obtained as Governor in arranging the lease, and was that right and proper?

[No Answer was returned.]

Pay of Officers in India.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state in how many departments the rates of pay of the superior officers in India have been increased during the last four years; what is the number of officers in each department benefiting by the new rates; and what is the additional annual charge imposed upon the revenues of India by these increases.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. MORLEY, Montrose Burghs): I will ask the Government of India to prepare a statement giving the information asked for.

Indian Government Appointments.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table a Return showing all new posts with a salary of £400 and upwards a year, created by the Government of India during the last seven years, together with the names of the officers at present holding these appointments.

MR. MORLEY: The labour involved in preparing a Return for seven years would be very great, but I have no objection to giving lists of appointments and salaries for the last four years, as in the Return asked for in the previous Question. Owing to the changes constantly taking place in the personnel list of the names of the officers holding the appointments would be of slight value, and I do not propose to include them. Lists are periodically published from which they may be ascertained.

Indian Excise Administration.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Excise Administration in India has been considered by the Government of India; and whether this Report, with a summary of the evidence, will be circulated to Members of Parliament before the debate upon the Indian Budget.

Mr. MORLEY: I have ascertained from the Government of India that the Report has not yet reached them, and that it is now not expected to be ready until at earliest the end of July.

Public Processions in Bengal.

Dr. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, acting under the recent circular of the Government of Eastern Bengal and Assam, which revokes the orders prohibiting the cry of "Bande Materam," but authorises the police to require by general and special notice that licences should be taken for processions in public places, the district superintendent of police of Rungpore has issued a notice that licences are to be taken for every procession and every meeting to be held in a public place; and whether in view of the pledges given to this House restoring to the people of the province the right of public processions and public meetings, subject only to interference to stay actual or imminent breaches of the peace, he proposes to take any action in the matter.

Mr. MORLEY: The special restrictions on processions having been withdrawn, the instructions of the Local Government are that licences under the ordinary law should not be withheld unless there is a serious risk of disturbance of public tranquillity. I have no information as to the case described in the Question, but I will take whatever steps may appear to me necessary to ensure that these instructions are not disregarded.

*Mr. REES: Was not the cry "Bande Mataram" originally assigned as a war cry to the Hindoo Sanyasis who rose against the Government in Bengal, and is not its use therefore likely to induce breaches of the peace between Hindoos and Mahomedans?

Mr. MORLEY: I do not know the origin of the phrase, but I will inquire.

The Partition of Bengal.

*Mr. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table any despatch or papers which will illustrate the difficulties with which the Government of the new province of Eastern Bengal has had to contend in consequence of the different attitude towards the creation of that province evinced by a section of the Hindus, who are the minority, and by the Mahomedans, who are the majority of the population.

Mr. MORLEY: As soon as I receive full official reports on this subject, for which I have telegraphed to the Government of India, I will at once consider the question of laying Papers on the Table.

Estate Duties.

Mr. SEARS (Cheltenham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what other duties than the formal business connected with estate duties are performed at probate registries; and what there is in such duties which collectors of Inland Revenue and their staff would not be competent to undertake.

I beg further to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the annual cost of the Government Estate Duty Office at Somerset House, which is £97,367, and to the fact that under the same roof, and subject to private patronage, there is the Principal Probate Registry, at an annual cost of £34,956, with officials not responsible to the Government; that in the latter office there is one registrar, at a salary of £1,600 a year, and two others, with salaries rising to £1,500 a year; that only routine duties are performed, which are more highly paid than in the Estate Duties Office, where the real work is done, the head of which is in receipt of £1,200 a year; will he inquire into the matter and take steps to end the Probate Registry and to effect a saving of public money.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): I would ask my hon. friend to allow me to reply to the two Questions as one. The duties of the Registrars and other officers of the Principal Probate Registry are absolutely distinct from those of the officers of the Estate Duty Office and necessitate considerable technical knowledge of the law. The duties include dealing with applications for representations to the estates of deceased persons, which involve questions of validity of wills, domicile and foreign law, hearing summonses in probate actions and divorce suits, taxation of costs, passing administrators' and receivers' accounts, and dealing with references as to alimony, variation of settlements and ownership of property under the Married Women's Property Acts, and completion of Orders made by the Court. The officers in the District Probate Registries have similar duties as to application for grants of probate in the district registries.

MR. SEARS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any official information showing that the examination of estate affidavits, at headquarters, and the disregard of local knowledge possessed by Revenue officers, is responsible for leakage of revenue, especially in a case in which duty was paid on £132,300 in 1898, in respect of an estate which, in 1900, was floated with a capital of £450,000, when profits were sufficient to pay all preference charges and give 8 per cent. to ordinary shareholders and to provide for a reserve fund; will he say what inquiry was made at the time in this case, in which the loss to the revenue appears to have been something like £20,000; will he say whether the sum of £450,000 represents the whole value of the estate in question; if not, what was the declared value of the remainder; what inquiry was made in respect of it; how such inquiry came about, and what was the result; and will he cause inquiries to be made as to whether there have been any other cases of inaccurate Returns to which the attention of the department has been drawn.

MR. ASQUITH: In the case to which my hon. friend refers, extreme care was taken by those responsible to arrive at a correct valuation of the estate, and full use was made of the local knowledge available. The particular item of property alluded to in the Question consisted of the interest in an enterprise of a precarious kind, the value of which lay almost entirely in good will. To determine the market value of such a property must necessarily be speculative, and it was of course impossible to foresee that a company would be formed to take over the business. This, in fact, did not occur till more than two years after the death of the owner; had the purchase been effected sooner, the valuation would have been corrected. As there appears no ground for questioning the correctness of the values assigned to the remaining items of the estate in question, I see no reason for adopting the unusual course of disclosing particulars in regard to them.

Discharges of Criminal Lunatics.

MR. MARNHAM (Surrey, Chertsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the recent murder at Camberley, and the propinquity of His Majesty's Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, greater care will in future be taken to ascertain that prisoners before being discharged can, with safety to the general public, be allowed at large.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I can assure the hon. Member that there is no ground for the suggestion that there is any want of care in discharging criminal lunatics from Broadmoor. If a lunatic is confined "during His Majesty's pleasure"—so that he can be discharged only by the Secretary of State's order—the utmost care is taken (in the few cases where the question of release can be entertained at all) to ascertain that the patient's recovery is of a permanent character, and that he can be allowed at large without danger to the public. An undertaking is obtained from some trustworthy relative or other person to look after the patient and to report periodically how he is, and, if any sign of relapse is reported, the discharge is revoked and the patient brought back. There are, however, some criminal lunatics not detained during His Majesty's pleasure, but under sentence for a definite term only. These cannot, generally speaking, be detained in Broadmoor after the sentence expires; they have to be removed to local asylums and then come under the ordinary lunacy law, and I have no longer any control over their discharge, which rests with the local asylum authorities.

Tramcar Accidents.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the recent accident occasioned by an electric tramcar, while descending Highgate Hill, getting beyond the control of the driver, and by which three people lost their lives and many were seriously injured, and, considering the number of street accidents of daily occurrence occasioned by the ineffective brake power now employed on tramcars, he will institute an inquiry with the object of obtaining the opinions of the highest authorities on the subject, with a view to compelling the use on tramcars of the most instantaneous and efficient method of arresting the progress of a tramcar.

MR. J. HENDERSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg at the same time to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state with what brake the electric car, which caused the accident at Highgate on Saturday last, was fitted; and whether the cars to which similar accidents happened at Swindon and Huddersfield this year were fitted with the same brake; and, if so, what steps he intends to take to have efficient brakes fitted to all electric cars.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): In the case of the Huddersfield and Swindon accidents of this year and also of the Highgate accident, I am informed that the cars were fitted, in addition to the ordinary hand-brake, with modern power-brakes, in compliance with the Board's regulations. Both the Swindon and Highgate accidents are now the subject of inquiries by officers of the Board of Trade, and until their reports are received I cannot say what lessons can be learnt from them in regard to brakes; but the question will certainly receive the most careful consideration on the part of the Board and their technical advisers.

MR. MYER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that, according to expert evidence given in April last in reference to an accident in Goldhawk road, an electric car travelling at four miles an hour could not be stopped under forty-five feet.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was not aware of that.

*MR. WATERLOW (Islington, N.) asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the magnetic brake with which this car was fitted became inoperative when the wheels of the vehicle skidded, as probably they did in this case, and caused the accident.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said no doubt that point would be inquired into.

MR. CAIRNS (Newcastle-on-Tyne) asked whether the question of compulsory stopping places on steep gradients would be inquired into.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe) asked whether any use on a steep incline was made of the rail brake—a brake acting on the rail—in which the weight of the car was brought to bear on the action.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he would call attention to both these points.

Island of Cumbrae Steamer Service.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the letter of the railway companies conducting the steamer service between the mainland of Scotland and the Island of Cumbrae, threatening the withdrawal of the steamers at the end of this month unless the present dispute as to pier dues is settled on the companies' terms; and whether, in view of the inconvenience to the public which is threatened by the withdrawal of the steamers, he will put himself in communication with the parties concerned, and suggest that the service should be continued and all matters in dispute be referred to an arbitrator to be appointed by the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes, Sir. This matter has been brought to my attention, and the Board of Trade are in communication with the companies concerned. The companies have not, however, so far consented to accept the suggestion mentioned.

Vagrancy Committee's Report.

MR. MARNHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the recent murder at Camberley, and still more recent murderous attacks in the same locality, the Government are considering the desirability of giving effect to the recommendations with regard to tramps, contained in the Vagrancy Committee Report, issued earlier in the session.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): The Report of the Departmental Committee on this subject is receiving the consideration of the Government; but it will not be practicable to propose legislation with regard to it during the present session.

Education Act—School Efficiency.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education what securities, if any, it is proposed to take to secure that any school contracted-out under his Amendment to Clause 4 of the Education Bill shall not fall below the level of educational efficiency demanded of the provided schools in the same area.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): It would seem that the provisions of the Code, as, for instance, Article 25 (b), will effectually secure what the hon. Member refers to.

Contracted-out Schools.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether any school, contracted-out under his Amendment to Clause 4 of the Education Bill, would be permitted to fall back to the system of one-man management; and, if not, whether he can state what arrangements, if any, it is proposed to take in respect to the management of such school.

MR. BIRRELL: The Government are most anxious to avoid any possibility of these schools falling back into a condition of things in which their management is in the hands of one individual. It is already laid down, in Article 51 (b) of the Code, as a condition of the payment of grants, that every public elementary school, not maintained by a local education authority, must have a responsible body of managers. This Article continues in the Code, and as it will apply to the schools referred to by the hon. Member, I think adequate security is provided against the danger to which he refers.

DR. MACNAMARA: Will the local authority managers be continued in office?

MR. BIRRELL: I do not think so.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): Will the Amendments on the Paper re-establish something analogous to the old boards of management?

MR. BIRRELL: I do not think so.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): Has the right hon. Gentleman considered whether a State-aided school will be a public elementary school?

MR. BIRRELL: That is a point which I think is in doubt at the present time. If it is a public elementary school, of course the conditions of the Code will apply to it. If it is not, there may be a gap in that respect, and I should have to see that it was altered.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University): When will the right hon. Gentleman put down his Amendment on that point?

MR. BIRRELL: I do not know; I have not made up my mind.

SIR E. CARSON: Will it be before or after the closure?

Pupil Teachers' Travelling Expenses.

MR. ARMITAGE (Leeds, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether a grant will be made to the county borough councils, similar to that to be made to the county councils, of £2 per year for travelling and other expenses of pupil teachers, seeing that in a scattered county borough area the costs to the pupil teachers are often in excess of those in a county area.

MR. BIRRELL: The Board are unable to accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member.

Holyrood Park.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if when he goes to Edinburgh to inspect the Law Courts he will visit Holyrood Park, and consider whether some money can be spent in making smoother roads and in replanting with grass or whin some of the slopes, notably that below Salisbury Crags.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): Yes, Sir.

Meteorological Science Grant.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress, if any, has been made in meteorological science in this country, within late years, to justify the Department in the expenditure of £15,000 per annum; and can he say whether in this region of occult experiment the nation is receiving good value for its money.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The annual Reports of the Meteorological Office which are presented to Parliament contain a record of the work of the office and of the allocation of funds. The hon. Member will find in the last Report a brief history of the work of the office since it received a Parliamentary Grant. Only a comparatively small proportion of the grant is applied to experimental work, the greater part being devoted to the normal work of the office, viz., the meteorology of the ocean, forecasting and storm warning, and land meteorology. The answer to the last part of the Question is in the affirmative.

Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew.

MR. BRANCH (Middlesex, Enfield): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will give a detailed Return of all plants sent out from the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew, to botanic and private gardens during the past five years, together with those received in exchange and otherwise during the same period.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): I have ascertained that the preparation of the proposed Return would entail considerable labour and expense, and, as at present advised, I scarcely think that its issue would be attended with any commensurate public utility. Perhaps, however, my hon. Friend would confer with me personally on the subject.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners, South London Estate.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for East Bristol, as Church Estates Commissioner, whether he will say if any of the buildings recently erected by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in South London will be used for the sale of beer, wine, or spirits; and, if so, how many.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.): None of the newly-erected buildings will be so used. On the other hand, one fully licensed public-house and three beer houses on the site of the new buildings have been suppressed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for East Bristol, as Church Estates Commissioner, whether he will say if the Ecclesiastical Commissioners make any condition in connection with those places on their estates which are, with their assent, licensed for the sale of beer, wine, or spirits as to the non-employment as barmaids of women other than the wife or daughters of the person holding the licence; and, if not, whether they will do so in future.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: No such stipulation is made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners nor do the Commissoners think it would be well for them to make a condition the performance of which it would not be in their power effectually to control.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for East Bristol, as Church Estates Commissioner, whether he will grant a Return of all public-houses and beer-houses on the estates of Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Return to state the name and locality, the approximate value to the Commissioners, the date of the lease or of the last extension or renewal of it, and the date when the lease will expire.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: The Ecclesiastical Commissioners are not prepared to make the suggested Return.

Colonel Malone's Westmeath Estate.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Colonel Malone's Baronstown estate, Westmeath, was inspected for sale in July, 1905; that subsequently one memorial was lodged with the Estates Commissioners with reference to trustees, and another asking certain untenanted farms to be divided among people in need of land; what causes the delay in attending to these matters; and, if collusive tenancies have been created, what are the dates of the agreements creating them.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Estates Commissioners inform me that the estate in question was inspected in May and June, 1905. The memorials referred to were received in February last and have been made the subject of a special report by the inspector, which report is at present under consideration. There has been no avoidable delay in dealing with this matter. The Commissioners are not aware of any cases of collusive tenancies on this estate, and it would appear from the documents lodged that in none of the cases of the non-judicial tenants were any of the tenancies created since 1901.

Irish Land Valuation—John Casey's Holdings.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the qualifications and experience of Mr. Thompson, land valuer, and the name of the person on whose recommendation he has been employed; on what ground has the Land Commission, in the case of Battersby, landlord, John Casey, tenant, Mullingar rural district, Westmeath, record No. 559, increased the area of the farm and increased the rent, notwithstanding the sworn evidence of competent valuers and of competent surveyors after a chain survey; does the law or do the rules extend to empowering the Land Commission to make a tenant pay for land he has not got; and, if not, will the true area and true rent, as ascertained by the county court, be restored.

MR. BRYCE: Mr. Thompson, who had been assistant Commissioner since May 22nd, 1890, was in 1903 appointed an assessor under the Land Act of that year as being a person of skill and experience in agriculture. He had for several years before appointment as assessor acted as appeal valuer to the Land Commission. His qualifications, when originally appointed, are stated in Parliamentary Paper No. 151 of 1902. I have no information as to the name of the person, if any, on whose recommendation he was appointed an assistant Commissioner. I am informed by the Land Commission that the particular case referred to in the Question was regularly heard on appeal and judicially decided in July, 1905, and the Commissioners hold that it would be irregular on their part to discuss the facts or evidence in such a case in answer to a Question.

MR. GINNELL: Seeing that the area was settled by the County Court Judge, will the Land Commissioners consent to a survey?

MR. BRYCE: Before answering that I must communicate with the Land Commission.

The Featherston-Whitney Estate.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland who is the purchase inspector on behalf of the Estates Commissioners in Westmeath; how soon will the Featherston-Whitney estate, Newpass, Rathowen, be inspected; and will labourers and applicants for enlargement of holdings on and adjoining the estate be informed of the date, and be seen by the inspector.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that their inspectors are not permanently assigned to districts, but are frequently changed from one district to another. The estate referred to will probably be inspected early next year. It is the practice of the inspectors to give due notice of their intended inspection to the tenants of the holdings, and also to applicants for untenanted land when they consider it necessary.

Irish Intermediate Education Board.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the action of the intermediate board in refusing to obey a Resolution of the House of Commons on a subject which the Irish people feel strongly on, and also seeing that this Board and the national board are unrepresentative and independent, he will appoint a Committee to inquire into and report on the possibility of getting a board appointed by the Irish people to manage primary, secondary, and technical education.

MR. BRYCE: Since the hon. Member gave notice of this Question, I have fully informed him of the facts in reply to a Question put by him on Monday.† It is not the case that the Board of Intermediate Education refuse to obey the Resolution of the House. I have told the hon. Member that three or four times already.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of my Question.

MR. BRYCE: That deals with a much larger Question.

Value of Tenant's Interest.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will get the Department of Agriculture to ascertain whether the tenant's occupation, interest, and improvements, when protected by the Land Act of 1881, have been sold at as high a price as the landlord's interest in the holding; and will the Department ascertain, for the information of this House and the guidance of the Estates Commissioners and their inspectors, what has been the average price of this tenant's property, in normal cases, in each county each year, during the last ten years, or at least since the Department was founded.

MR. BRYCE: I am not prepared to ask the Department of Agriculture to go outside its proper sphere, and undertake enquiries in connection with the Land Act of 1903, the administration of which has been assigned by Parliament to the Estates Commissioners.

Land Purchase Inspectors.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when does he expect that the Return relating to land purchase inspectors will be ready.

MR. BRYCE: It is anticipated that this Return will be ready in the course of a few days.

Cleaver Estate, County Roscommon.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the tenants of the Cleaver estate, Lisagallon, county Roscommon, have purchased their holdings under the Act of 1903; whether the purchasers include Mr. James D. O'Connor, an extensive landlord in the county, for a large grazing farm on this estate; whether the money has been actually advanced in respect of this holding; and, if not, whether the Estates Commissioners will take into consideration the advisability of acquiring it for distribution amongst the small tenants on the estate.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that an originating application in respect of the sale of this estate was lodged in June, 1905. The advances, however, have not yet been sanctioned, nor has the estate been inspected. Amongst the purchasing tenants is Mr. J. D. O'Connor, who holds a farm of 138 acres at a judicial rent fixed in 1887. When the estate comes before the Commissioners for ruling, they will, they inform me, consider the suggestion contained in the latter part of the Question.

Great Seal of Ireland.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the arms represented on the Great Seal of Ireland are those of England, whereas the arms represented on the Great Seals of England and Scotland are those of those countries; and if he will take the necessary steps to have the arms of Ireland, and not those of England, represented on the Irish Great Seal.

† See Col. 605-6.

MR. BRYCE: I have referred this Question to the Lord Chancellor's Department, and am informed that prior to the Union between Great Britain and Ireland the Great Seal of Ireland was similar in general character and design to that of Great Britain, but differed from the latter by bearing the distinguishing mark of a harp crowned; and it would appear that, neither on the passing of the Act of Union nor since, has any change been made in the Great Seal of Ireland, so that this distinguishing mark still remains, although the arms which are represented on the Seal are the same. I understand that the Royal Arms cannot be altered in Ireland without a proclamation by His Majesty in Council.

Birth Certificate Fees.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a charge of 3s. 7d. is made by the clerks of unions for supplying copies of certificates of births to boys who are desirous of competing in intermediate examinations, while such certificates can be obtained for the sum of 6d. in the ordinary way; and whether, seeing that many boys were debarred from entering the intermediate examinations just held because of their parents' inability to pay the necessary fee, he will consider the advisability of abolishing it altogether in these cases.

MR. BRYCE: Superintendent registrars are entitled to charge a fee of 3s. 7d. for a certificate of birth, except in cases where special statutory provision is made for the payment of a smaller fee. Thus, in cases in which the certificate is required for any purpose connected with the elementary education, or with the employment, of a child, a fee of 6d. is payable, but the hon. Member is mistaken in thinking that certificates of birth can, in the ordinary way, be obtained for that sum. The Commissioners of Intermediate Education inform me that they would welcome any legislation which would have the effect of lowering the charge for certificates of birth for the purposes of their examinations. The question will receive the consideration of the Government when a suitable opportunity arises.

Constabulary Fund.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what is the total amount standing to the credit of the Constabulary Force Fund; and whether, seeing that this fund only applies to members of the force who joined before 1883, and the fact that the fund is gradually dying out, he will consider the advisability of winding the fund up.

*MR. BRYCE: On March 31st, 1906, the National Debt Commissioners held £228,284, Consolidated Annuities, and £154,000, Local Loans Stock, belonging to the Benefit Branch of the Constabulary Force Fund, and at the same date the Inspector-General held a cash balance of £3,936. The benefit branch is being gradually wound up, and the surplus which may remain after its final liabilities have been discharged is to be surrendered to the Exchequer. For the details of the subject, I would refer the hon. Member to Parliamentary Paper No. 118 of 1891.

MR. SLOAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of winding the fund up?

*MR. BRYCE: It is being wound up.

Ardara (Donegal) Evicted Tenant.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners are taking any and, if so, what, steps towards the restoration to his holding of Patrick Keeney, who was evicted, on June 9th, 1887, from Castledoherty, near Ardara, county Donegal, a farm which is still lying unoccupied and in which the tenant is anxious to be reinstated.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they will in due course have inquiry made by an inspector into the application for reinstatement lodged by Patrick Keeney, whose former holding is stated to be unoccupied.

Irish Local Government Board—Mr. Monteith's Appointment.

MR. MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a Mr. Monteith has recently been appointed to a position in the Irish Local Government Board Office; can he say what are the necessary qualifications and salary attached to the office now held by Mr. Monteith; did he pass the Civil Service or any other examinations; what was Mr. Monteith's previous occupation; on whose recommendation was the appointment made; over how many existing officers was Mr. Monteith appointed: and if the appointment is permanent and carries a pension.

*MR. BRYCE: I am informed that Mr. Monteith was temporarily employed at a salary of £4 4s. a week, to assist the Local Government Board's inspectors in reporting on sites for labourers' cottages. The appointment of assistant to the inspectors was made in time of pressure to enable the Board to expedite the work of the inspectors. No qualifications have been prescribed for the office in question, which is only a temporary one, and does not entitle the holder to a pension. Mr. Monteith was not appointed over the head of any existing officers and was not required to pass any examination. He was previously employed as assistant private secretary to the late Chief Secretary both at the Irish Office and at the Local Government Board for England. Mr. Monteith was first employed by the Vice-President of the Board upon his personal knowledge of Mr. Monteith's capabilities.

MR. MEEHAN: Seeing that there are thousands of educated Irishmen constantly leaving the country through want of employment, will the right hon. Gentleman take care that in future these offices shall be filled by Irishmen instead of being handed over to strangers?

*MR. BRYCE said it would be dangerous to lay down any general rule. Presumably in these cases preference was given to Irishmen, but a hard and fast rule might be to the disadvantage of Irishmen so far as posts in England and Scotland were concerned.

MR. MEEHAN: But are there not thousands of Irishman qualified for this position?

*MR. BRYCE: No doubt.

MR. MEEHAN: Then why not appoint an Irishman?

Irish Land Commission Staff.

MR. MEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say if there are 207 officers on the clerical staff of the Irish Land Commission with minimum salaries from £200 to £70, maximum from £300 to £100; whether a number have over fifteen years service; whether any of these officers possessed the necessary qualifications to discharge the duties of the office to which Mr. Wilkinson, an outsider, was lately appointed; if so, and in view of the want of ability on the part of the staff, will he take steps to raise the standard of qualifying examinations for admission to the service; and can he say on whose recommendation Mr. Wilkinson was appointed, and were his qualifications tested; if so, by whom, and the date of the examination.

*MR. BRYCE: I am afraid that I cannot usefully add much to my replies to the hon. Member's Questions of May 3rd and 23rd.† The post to which reference is made is one requiring special qualifications, which Mr. Wilkinson, who is a skilled accountant of many years experience, was found to possess. Before the appointment was made, the qualifications and merits of the existing staff were fully considered, and in appointing Mr. Wilkinson I am informed that regard was had solely to the efficiency of the public service.

MR. MEEHAN: On whose recommendation was this appointment made?

*MR. BRYCE: I cannot say.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Whose poor relation is he?

Dublin Audit Dispute.

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that in the mandamus proceedings pending between the auditor of the Local Government Board and the Corporation of Dublin, the Local Government Board for Ireland are represented before the court by the same counsel as invariably appeared for that body during the past ten years, with, as junior, the son of the Attorney General for Ireland in the last † See (4) Debates, clvi., 701; clvii., 1278.

Government; if he will say whether there was a case where, a Tory Government being in power, the Irish Local Government Board drew even one of their counsel from the opposite side; and if he can explain why, in a case of such importance as this to local bodies in Ireland, the Government passed over their own Solicitor-General.

*MR. BRYCE: In the proceedings referred to in the Question, the auditor acts quite independently of the Local Government Board, and is represented by solicitors and counsel of his own selection. The Board are not party to those proceedings, and are represented only by counsel familiar with the special work of the Board with watching briefs. There was, therefore, no occasion for asking a barrister occupying the official position of the Solicitor-General to appear in the present case. It has, I am informed, frequently happened that the Local Government Board have been represented during the past ten years by counsel holding Liberal opinions. I understand that their regular junior standing counsel holds those opinions. When cases of high importance arise, the Board secure the presence, in addition to their usual standing counsel, of the law officers, or one of them.

Miss Ffrench's Galway Estate.

MR. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on the estate of Miss Kathleen Ffrench, of Monivea Castle, county Galway, agreed on terms of sale in April, 1905; that the request for sale was lodged with the Land Commission in October, 1905; will he say whether the estate has yet been inspected or when it will be; and what are the terms of the tenants' present liability, either to the landlord or the Land Commission.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have no information that terms of sale have been agreed upon between the landlord and tenants in this case. It is the case that the landlord, in October last, lodged a request that the Estates Commissioners should purchase the estate, and this request is at present under consideration. As no sale appears to have taken place, it is presumed that the tenants' liability to the landlord, whatever it may have been, remains unchanged.

Lord Clanricarde and his Tenants.

MR. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that notices to quit have been served by the Marquess of Clanricarde on ten tenant farmers in Derrygoolan, a congested district of his Galway estate; whether the tenants served with notice to quit have have always paid, and are prepared to pay, their rents; and whether the Government will take any steps to protect these tenants.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the estate of the Marquess of Clanricarde, in the county of Galway, the tenantry are being harassed for old arrears of rent, accumulated through bad years long ago, and in many other ways; that on this estate the tenantry have by various devices been deprived of all the benefits intended by this House to be conferred on them by recent Irish Land Acts; whether he is aware that, in consequence of those proceedings, a condition of things exists on this estate which is a constant menace to the public peace; and whether the Government will consider the desirability of introducing a special Bill to deal with the situation at present existing on the Clanricarde estate.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have no knowledge of the facts alleged in these two Questions, and I have, therefore, no official information at my disposal which would enable me to answer the Questions. The Government have no legal power to interfere for the protection of the tenants mentioned. The hon. Member will, I think, appreciate the difficulty there would be in introducing legislation in regard to a particular estate.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked whether this was not a matter affecting the Land Commission rather than the Estates Commission, and why, if these people paid their rent, "this man should be allowed to upset the whole community."

Mr. BRYCE did not suppose that the Land Commission could give him any further information than the Estates Commission. Certainly they had no more power to interfere.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked whether the proper people to apply to for information were not the local police. How could a question of this kind come to the knowledge of either the Estates or the Land Commissson ?

Mr. BRYCE said that he, of course, received reports from the police as to what happened, but, as the hon. Gentleman would understand, there were serious difficulties in the way of making the police report on land conditions.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Are we to understand that Lord Clanricarde, his tenants being perfectly willing to pay their rents, is to be at liberty to evict ten men for no cause whatever——

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is making a speech.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, it wants a speech.

*Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that not many years ago several Unionists in Ireland suggested that a Bill should be brought in for the compulsory expropriation of Lord Clanricarde.

Mr. ROCHE wished to understand whether these tenants had no redress, and that the only remedy was their own act in the future. He warned the right hon. Gentleman——

*Mr. SPEAKER: This is not the time for speeches.

Mr. ROCHE asked if he was in order in saying——

*Mr. SPEAKER: No; I am afraid it is not in order to say anything now.

Mr. ROCHE thought he was in order in asking whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware of the consequences that might ensue from the Answer he had just given, and the inference that these tenants must rely on themselves for their own protection.

Mr. BRYCE: I am aware of this, that any disorder is the worst thing that can happen in the interests of the Irish tenants.

*Mr. KILBRIDE: What can they do ?

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Lord Clanricarde has been called in a court of justice a standing menace to the peace of the country ?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: That is what he is.

*Mr. KILBRIDE: Will the right hon. Gentleman lend the forces of the Crown to evict the tenants in these cases ?

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give notice of that.

Mr. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of John Madden, a tenant of Lord Clanricarde's, in the parish of Portuma, county of Galway; whether he is aware that John Madden had been served with an ejectment on the 28th September, 1905, and decreed that in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1896, Madden paid two years' rent and costs on the 22nd May, 1906, and thereby stayed the ejectment, and that on the 28th May, 1906, a writ from the Superior Courts was served on Madden, claiming the year's rent and costs; and whether the Irish Government will take any steps to protect tenants from such treatment.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have no knowledge of the matter referred to, but so far as I can judge from the documents which the hon. Member has sent for my inspection, the facts appear to be substantially as stated in the Question. The Government have no power to interfere in legal proceedings which may be taken by a landlord for the recovery of rent.

Mr. DILLON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this House introduced a special clause into an Act of Parliament to protect tenants on this precise information from eviction? Is not this a direct evasion of the Act?

MR. BRYCE: I have already said that the Government have no legal power to interfere.

Gethin Estate, County Sligo.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Sligo N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the case of the Gethin estate, Magherow, county Sligo, a man named Michael M'Loughlin has been dismissed from a position he had held for over twenty years in connection with Ballyconnell farm, and another man named Carroll had been appointed in his place by the inspector of the Congested Districts Board; and whether in view of the dissatisfaction aroused in the district by the action of the Board's inspector, he will bring this matter under the attention of the Board, with a view to the redress of the alleged grievance.

MR. BRYCE: I have brought this question to the notice of the Congested Districts Board, who will have enquiries made into the matter referred to; and I will in due course apprise the hon. Member of the result.

Irish Herring Industry.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the fees collected for branding herrings in Scotland during the year 1905 amounted to £8,070, and that, after allowing for the cost of collection, there was a surplus of £2,627; whether he is aware that during the past twenty-four years the total proceeds of branding fees in Scotland amounted to £176,824, and that, after allowing for the cost of collection, the surplus amounted to £48,588; and whether, in view of the fact that the use of the brand has been of the greatest value for the marketing of Scotch herrings, and that through its institution a sum of nearly £50,000 has been rendered available for the improvement of the fishing industry in Scotland, he will consider the advisability of instituting a brand for Irish cured mackerel and herrings, and of utilising the Irish national trade mark for the purpose.

MR. BRYCE: The figures quoted by the hon. Member are for the year 1904, and appear to be correct. The question of establishing a brand for Irish fish has been carefully considered. Some years ago the chief mackerel curers informed the Inspectors of Fisheries that they would not adopt a Government brand. Since then a very important herring-curing trade has been established in Ireland, and I am informed, though I can hardly credit it, that Irish cured herrings fetch more than double the price of the best Scotch herrings in continental markets. Moveover, I understand that the best Scotch herrings are not branded at all. If a Government brand for Irish fish were to be paid for out of branding fees, the cost to the curers per barrel would be much greater than in Scotland, both because curing is carried on at a greater number of centres, and because herring curing and mackerel curing take place at the same season in different parts of Ireland. As at present advised, I do not think a brand for Ireland is practicable.

Luggacurran Evicted Tenants.

MR. MEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware if the Estates Commissioners, through their inspector, Mr. Cunningham, have appointed Mr. Bates, civil engineer, county Down, to superintend the completion of seven cottages for evicted tenants at Luggacurran; whether, according to the terms of contract, these seven cottages should have been completed last December; whether he is aware if there are two civil engineers (one a Board of Works local inspector), inspectors under the Labourers Acts in the union of Carlow and Athy, resident in the immediate neighbourhood of Luggacurran; were either of them offered the superintendence of the seven cottages; on what grounds was the expense incurred of appointing a special civil engineer for this duty; and what are the terms of Mr. Bates's appointment, salary and expenses.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the superintendence of the building of the houses referred to is being carried out by their permanent officials, and no special appointments have been made in connection therewith. Mr. Bates, who is one of their surveyors, is a non-pensionable officer at a salary of £120 rising to £180 with an allowance of 10s. a day when absent from home on duty. This gentleman, who is a civil engineer, has been superintending under the Commissioners' Inspector the erection of the houses in question, which will be shortly visited and reported on by the senior surveyor of the Commissioners. As to the reasons for the non-completion of the contract at the specified time, namely, March last, I beg to refer to my reply to the hon. Member's Question of 21st May.

MR. KILBRIDE: Was not the date mentioned in the contract December and not March ?

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware of that.

MR. KILBRIDE: I am.

Clanricarde Evicted Tenants.

MR. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, upon the passing of the Land Bill of 1903, about 200 evicted tenants on the Clanricarde estate applied to the Estates Commissioners for reinstatement; how many have been, and how many have got new holdings.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received applications from 131 persons seeking reinstatement upon the estate referred to. The Commissioners have not reinstated any of these evicted tenants in their former holdings, but they have provided three of them with new holdings on a neighbouring estate.

Woodford Dog License Prosecution.

MR. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether is aware that a man named James M'Mahon was charged on the 14th May at the Woodford petty sessions with having an unlicensed dog in his possession, and that the policeman who summoned him admitted in court that he did not see any dog in his possession, and that in addition M'Mahon and his son denied having any dog; and whether, seeing that M'Mahon was fined 2s. and the costs, the Lord Chancellor's attention will be called to the decision of the magistrates who acted on the occasion.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply to his previous Question of 28th May,† when I informed him that the sufficiency of the evidence was a matter for the magistrates, and that I could not undertake to discuss the details of the case. I do not think that any good purpose would be served by calling the Lord Chancellor's attention to the matter. The judicial decisions of magistrates can only be reviewed by courts of law.

MR. JOHN ROCHE: The man never had a dog at all.

Irish Lunacy Grant.

MR. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the capitation grant to lunatic asylums in Ireland is not paid to the county councils until the year following that in respect of which the expenditure is made, and that owing to the change in the local financial year the asylum committees were obliged to issue demands to the county councils for fifteen months cost of maintenance of pauper lunatics from 1st January, 1899, to 31st March, 1900; is he aware that a capitation grant was paid in the year 1901 in respect of twelve months service only, from 1st April, 1899, to 31st March, 1900, and no more than a year's grant has since been paid in respect of the subsequent annual service; and in view of the fact that the county councils were obliged to make good the difference of three months' gap, will he see that the councils are recouped from the local taxation account.

MR. BRYCE: The capitation grant to lunatic asylums in Ireland is paid to the county councils in the year following that in respect of which the expenditure is made on which the amount of the grant is calculated, but the grant is applicable in relief of the rates in the year in which it is actually paid. It is the fact that owing to the change in the local financial year the Asylum Committees were obliged to issue demands to the county councils for fifteen months cost of maintenance of pauper lunatics from 1st

† See (4) Debates, clviii., 83.

January, 1899, to 31st March, 1900. It is also the fact that the capitation grant paid in the year 1901 was in respect of of twelve months' service from 1st April, 1899, to 31st March, 1900, and that no more than a year's grant has since been paid in respect of the subsequent annual service. The year's grant paid in 1901 corresponded to the year's grant paid in previous years, the only difference made by the change in the financial year in 1899 being that instead of taking the calendar year as the basis of the grant as had been done previously, the financial year ending 31st March was taken as the basis. I have already informed the hon. Member that as in each year a full year's payment has been made from the Local Taxation Account, no recoupment to county councils is possible.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON LAW.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork) drew attention to the fact that the name of the hon. Member for Mid Cork had not been included among those of the hon. Members added to the Standing Committee on Law to consider the Irish Labourers' Bill. He remarked that the hon. Member was President of the Irish Land Labourers' Association, and was really the only Member elected to the House to represent that class. Obviously if they were to have a voice in discussing the proposed Amendments to the Bill, they ought to have their spokesman on the Committee, and he wished to know how the omission could be remedied.

*MR. SPEAKER said the duty of appointing additional Members rested with the Committee of Selection, and it would be undesirable for the House, seeing that it had entrusted that responsible and important duty to the Committee, now to take it out of their hands. In making additions the Committee's duty was to have regard to the special qualifications and capabilities of the Members whom they put on. The hon. Member might approach the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, who in the event of a vacancy occurring might fill it in the way desired by the hon. Member.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Thank you, Sir. I will act on that suggestion.

Dissemination of News in War Time.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the meeting of representative journalists and newspaper proprietors, held at the Royal United Service Institution on the 21st inst., at which there was a unanimous expression of opinion in favour of restricting or controlling the dissemination of news in time of war, and at which a Committee was authorised to confer with the Committee of Imperial Defence, and to consider any Bill that might be drafted with this object in view; and if he can hold out any hopes that His Majesty's Government will be in a position to introduce a Bill dealing with this subject at an early date.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): The question of restricting the dissemination of news in time of war is being considered by the Committee of Imperial Defence. His Majesty's Government hope to deal with it early next year.

MR. ARTHUR LEE asked if the right hon. Gentleman would consider the desirability of introducing a Bill—not necessarily for passing this session—at as early a date as possible, that the Press might have the opportunity it desired of giving careful consideration to the Government proposals. It was obvious that such a Bill could not be passed without the consent and co-operation of the Press.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think there are means of communicating the views of the Government otherwise than by introducing a Bill.

Expiring Laws.

MR. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of repeated declarations of Ministers, he proposes to include the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, or any other temporary Irish Coercion Act, in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill this Session.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Member asked me a similar Question a fortnight ago, and I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to him.†

MR. O'MARA: I will put it down this day week.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I shall not be in a better position to give an Answer then.

MR. O'MARA: Then this day fortnight.

The Dogs Bill.

MR. MORRELL (Oxfordshire, Henley): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when the Government propose to take the Report stage of the Dogs Bill.

SIR. H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any definite undertaking at the moment. The Dogs Bill comes within that list of Bills as to which neither confident hope nor absolute despair would seem to be justifiable.

The Agricultural Vote.

MR. MORRELL: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the Agricultural Vote was not reached as expected last Thursday, and of the importance of allowing time for an adequate discussion of this subject, the Government can see their way to reconsider the arrangements announced on Monday, so as to place this Vote first on one of the allotted days.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am sorry that I cannot see my way to alter the arrangements already announced to the House. We will do our best to give an opportunity for discussion.

Public Rights of Way.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the frequency with which public rights of way are being closed and access to the open country barred by owners of land, he will take immediate steps, by legislation or otherwise, to protect the public in their enjoyment of these ancient rights.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My hon. friend is no doubt aware that under the Local Government Act, 1894, it is the duty of every district council to protect all public rights of way and to prevent as far as possible the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way where such stoppage or obstruction would in their opinion be prejudicial to the interests of their district. In a parish in a rural district the parish council or the parish meeting can put the district council in motion, and if the district council refuse to take proceedings the county council if petitioned by the parish may act in their place. Moreover, it is laid down in the same Act that no public right of way can be stopped in a rural parish without the consent of the parish council, or parish meeting, and of the rural district council. It is difficult to see what further legislation in the way of giving powers to local authorities can be desired, but if my hon. friend has any suggestions to make I shall be glad to consider them.

Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Bill.

MR. HEATON-ARMSTRONG (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to proceed with the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Bill.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe that the Standing Committee on Law are to proceed with the Bill to-morrow.

The Attack on British Officers in Egypt.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether he has been made aware that this morning four Egyptians were sentenced to death by the special Court in connection with the unfortunate affair at Denshawi, and whether he can undertake to obtain a respite of the execution of this sentence until the Foreign Minister has had an opportunity of looking into the circumstances and the evidence given before the Court.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not heard anything of the circumstance referred to by the hon. Member, but I assure him that he can trust to the discretion and humanity of my right hon. friend the Foreign Secretary and of those on whose opinion he will rely.

† See (4) Debates, clviii., 971.

Progress of the Education Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the Government had put down an Amendment to Clause 5 of the Education Bill which they might not reach in time to discuss. He desired, therefore, to ask the Minister for Education whether the intention and effect of that Amendment was not to deprive those who in the future, owing to some movement of population or for some other cause, built a school for denominational purposes from having that appeal to the Education Board which was given under Clause 4. That was a question of vital importance for all those who looked forward to the needs that might arise as population increased or moved from place to place.

MR. BIRRELL said the words referred to by the right hon. Gentleman were added for the purpose of making quite plain what might possibly otherwise be obscure, though he did not think so, that the provisions as to an appeal to the Board of Education applied only to existing voluntary schools and were not intended to apply to future schools coming into existence.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) asked whether, if a transferred voluntary school under Clause 3, which when transferred was not qualified for the four-fifths facilities, subsequently became qualified, an appeal would lie to the Board of Education.

MR. BIRRELL replied that that did not arise out of the question put to him by the right hon. Gentleman, but he would consider it.

LORD R. CECIL asked the Prime Minister whether he was aware that, so far, only three lines out of forty-four in Clause 4 had been discussed in Committee, and that many important questions still remained to be discussed, including the Amendments of the Government; and whether, under these circumstances, he would make arrangements to secure reasonable discussion of the remainder of the clause.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Such arrangements as are possible under what we call the guillotine will, no doubt, be made. We cannot alter that. The House has agreed to certain Resolutions regarding the progress of this Bill in Committee, and we cannot depart from those now. But within the time afforded to us it rests rather with Members of the House than with the Government not to spend time on comparatively unimportant Amendments, but to reserve themselves and the time of the House for questions that are of real value and interest.

LORD R. CECIL: Could the right hon. Gentleman say whether, so far, the discussion has been devoted to questions of small importance, and whether he knows that at the time the guillotine Resolutions were passed the Government had not given notice of or put down their Amendments?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Amendments put down by the Government, so far from making a larger call upon the time of the House, have made a smaller call. ["Oh."] Yes; because they had the effect of focussing and codifying, as it were, certain important Amendments and suggestions which existed on the Paper at the time in the name of different Members. I am certain that the course taken by the Government in putting down a scheme of Amendments, as it did at the end of last week, has greatly facilitated the proper and regular discussion of this clause.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether among the things that have been focussed and codified by the Amendments put down by the Government he could suggest any Amendment which proposed that there should be a new class of schools called State-aided schools?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am under the impression that everything included in the Amendments of the Government had been before the House in one form or another before.

MEAT MARKING (IRELAND) BILL.

"To provide for Marking of important Meat in Ireland," presented by Mr. Field; supported by Mr. Condon, Mr. Patrick O'Brien, Captain Donelan, and Mr. O'Mara; to be read a second time upon Tuesday, 17th July, and to be printed. [Bill 279.]

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 4:—

*MR. VILLIERS (Brighton) moved an Amendment the effect of which would be to allow Cowper-Temple instruction to be given side by side with denominational teaching. He said he wished his speech could be as short as his Amendment, but he was afraid that was impossible, as it was only to leave out the word "the" in the second line on page 3. The Amendment might appear a very trivial one, but the Committee would see that it had far-reaching results. There was nothing in the whole of the Bill against Cowper-Temple instruction until they reached this clause. If a school became a transferred school ipso facto Cowper-Temple teaching was allowed. By this clause facilities were granted, under certain conditions, for special religious instruction to be given, and the clause then referred to that instruction as the religious instruction of the school that was to say, the whole, not part, of the religious instruction. If the hon. Members would read the clause they would see it inferred that, when once facilities were granted, those facilities would cover the whole field of religious instruction given in the school. As the clause now stood no provision whatever was made for the minority; when facilities were granted the local authority must either turn the children out or allow them to remain—he did not say to be converted or perverted, but verted to another denomination than that to which their parents belonged. But if the clause were without that little word "the" there was nothing whatever to prevent the local authorities from giving Cowper-Temple instruction alongside of denominational teaching if they considered the circumstances warranted it. In the case of a school of 400 children, though it might be able to prove its four-fifths, the local authority might say "why should the minority" (and one-fifth of 400 meant eighty children), "why should these eighty children be compelled to cross perhaps three more dangerous crossings or go another half mile, with the only alternative of becoming little Anglicans or Roman Catholics?" A mother thought more of one dangerous crossing than all the "isms" in the world. In a case of that kind local authorities might easily refuse these facilities, but, on the other hand, if this small word in the clause were omitted they might say, "Yes, we will grant you your facilities, because we find there is another room in the school where Cowper-Temple instruction can be given, and there is nothing in the Bill to prevent it. Here, to his mind, was an Amendment which ought to appeal to all those in favour of popular control, because it gave the local authority more power to deal with exceptional cases. The ballot mitigated the coercion of the priest, and this Amendment would relieve the coercion of circumstances. He did not believe the local authority would use this power in any frivolous or partial way. The Amendment in many instances would favour the denominations by enabling them to receive facilities which they otherwise would not obtain, and the minority would be protected. He thought the Committee would see that the Amendment had a good deal to be said for it. By getting rid of the definite article they could change the clause into a different article. If the Government accepted the Amendment it would go a long way towards converting the irritating "claws" into velvet paws.

"In page 3, line 2, to leave out the word 'the.'"—(Mr. Villiers.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'the' stand part of the clause."

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.) said the Amendment was wholly inconsistent with Clause 4, which, whether people liked it or not, was to secure teaching of a denominational character. The whole object of the clause was to secure that the schools which fulfilled the very rigorous condition laid down in subsection (b) should be allowed to have the denominational teaching which was desired and no other. He did not think they could take into their consideration the question of the minority children for which no provision was made under the four-fifths clause. They went to the school because they liked it, and if they did not wish to they need not go. To accept the Amendment of his hon. friend would be to destroy to a considerable degree the denominational basis and the intention of the clause; therefore it was impossible for the Government to accept it.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said it certainly appeared to him that the course indicated in the Amendment was a very desirable one to adopt in the interests of a real and true settlement. He felt sure that they would have ultimately to come round to that settlement, because there was no other. He hoped that the Government, after carefully considering the matter more fully, would conclude that it was in the interests of that peace which they professed so much to desire that they should accept the solution suggested in the Amendment.

Lord MORPETH (Birmingham, S.) complained that Clause 4 was so restricted as to be almost valueless. They were told that it had to be so restricted in order to protect the children in single school areas. There was practically no school in England or Wales which had not more than one class room, and more than one teacher, and it would be perfectly easy to take the minority of the scholars into another room, and have them taught separately, without any injustice being done. The Amendment would enable the Government to sweep away one of the worst restrictions in the Clause, namely, that which limited it to certain areas by taking an arbitrary fraction of the parents, and saying that only where that fraction existed should denominational facilities be given. The Amendment made for elasticity and freedom in giving such religious teaching as was desired by the parents of the children.

Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) considered that the Amendment would enable the children in a minority in a four-fifths school to receive religious instruction if their parents wished it.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Villiers and Viscount Morpeth.

MR. BIRRELL moved to insert words in Section 1 (a) requiring that the wishes of the parents in regard to extended facilities for special religious instruction should be ascertained as the result of a ballot taken in accordance with regulations made for the purpose by the Board of Education. So far as he understood there had been no great opposition in regard to this proposal. He thought the only point they had to consider was whether the Board of Education should not be left free to make the rules necessary for taking the ballot. He moved this Amendment because he believed this to be the best way of removing all suspicion as to the result they wished to make plain—namely, that the wishes of the parents had been consulted genuinely and properly, and without extraneous pressure. That was a suspicion which was easily raised in people's breasts, whether it was justified or not. This would be a valuable safeguard of subsection (a). He believed the ballot was generally recognised as the best means now known of getting the unbiassed opinion of a locality. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed--

"In page 3, line 7, after the word 'that,' to insert the words 'as the result of a ballot taken as to the wishes of the parents in accordance with regulations made for the purpose by the Board of Education it appears that.'"—(Mr. Birrell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) did not raise any abstract objection to the ballot, but he thought the Government left the matter far too vague. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was to ascertain the wishes of the parents, uninfluenced by any extraneous persuasion or any question of pressure from any extraneous authority. His complaint was that this was a very unfair and unsatisfactory way of getting at the truth in the matter. He thought that, if the Government were reluctant to introduce into the Bill the regulations which they proposed to issue, they ought, at all events, to lay on the Table of the House before the Bill got much further, and certainly before it passed the Report stage, the kind of instructions which would be sent round to the various schools. There were two points in particular to which he attached importance and which he asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider. In the first place, the ballot ought to be taken by a thoroughly independent and impartial body. They should not be a body which had a distinct motive to arrive at one result rather than another. The right hon. Gentleman had truly said that it was very easy to raise suspicion that pressure had been put on individuals in regard to their votes. It was also very easy to raise suspicion that the decision had not been taken fairly, and therefore it was very important that the method of taking the ballot should be independent of all parties, including the local authority. There was another and far more important point, and that was as to the kind of question to be put to the parents. The right hon. Gentleman had probably interested himself with the problem of the referendum as applied to political matters in some States. This was the referendum, and as the only answer to the question asked would be "Aye," or "No," everything turned on the form in which the question was prepared. It was absolutely necessary that the question put should be one which really elicited the point whether the parents desired the teaching in a particular school to go on in the future as in the past. The Government ought to tell the Committee in what form they thought the referendum should be put to the parents; it should be in one simple, clear form.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said he had no objection to the ballot; on the contrary, he favoured it; but he thought the points put by the Leader of the Opposition were of vital importance. Really they could not come to any decision on the matter until they knew what kind of question was going to be put. It was perfectly possible, without any deep design, that the parents might not know what was meant by the question they would have to ballot upon; for example, if they were simply asked whether they desired special facilities under Clause 4. The point put by the right hon. Gentleman was a reasonable and most important one, and they should have, before the Bill passed out of Committee, a draft of the regulations that were to obtain with regard to the taking of the ballot. The question put should be simple and should not be framed with any desire to carry out one particular view. He was sure that the Minister for Education would be able to give an assurance that the ballot would not be taken by people who were thoroughly hostile to the granting of the facilities. There was one other point. In order to take this ballot it would be necessary to keep in every school a complete register of parents. He did not say that that was a very difficult task; but it was absolutely essential to the carrying out of Clause 4, whether they had a ballot or not. When he advocated a committee of parents one difficulty that was raised against him was the impossibility of keeping a register of parents. But Clause 4 could not be put into operation at all unless a register of parents was kept very carefully. He confessed that if a plan could be devised by which a committee of parents could be fairly elected to represent the schools it would be a very much simpler scheme than that proposed by the Minister for Education.

MR. STUART (Sunderland) said that certain alterations would be necessary in this subsection if the words proposed by the Minister for Education were adopted. So long as Subsection (a) stood as originally framed it would be quite easy to carry it out; but the moment the ballot was introduced it would be impossible to say whether it was four-fifths of the parents or four-fifths of the children. If the ballot of which he approved was introduced, the remainder of the clause must be altered so as to make it possible to determine what was meant by the ballot.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the point raised by the hon. Gentleman was important, and he took shame to himself that he had not seen it before. He was not anxious to find a case against the ballot; but, after all, it was the children they had to consider. The Bill was originally framed on the right lines according to the number of children that would be affected, and not the number of parents. The new proposal entirely destroyed the old form of the clause.

MR. STUART said that the difficulty could be met by issuing ballot forms according to the number of children.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not know what the rural voter was going to do if he had to deal not only with the ballot but with plural voting. But he thought the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman was well worth considering.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said that the Committee were at a disadvantage in not having before them the regulations for taking the ballot. In the Public Libraries Act, if a ballot was taken, another ballot could not be taken until a certain number of years had elapsed. Under this subsection, was the judgment of the parents of a particular locality to be final?

*MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) said that each child would be supplied with a little voting paper to take home for the purpose of the ballot. The ballot would be according to the number of children and not the number of parents. From the beginning he had been opposed to the clause. He believed it was a bad clause. The more it was examined the more impossible it would be found. He did not agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the number of children should govern this question at all. It should be four-fifths of the parents of the children. The clause would enable a parent if he had six children to give three ballot papers in one direction and three in another. [AN HON. MEMBER: Why not?] It would balance one-half of a family against the other. He mentioned these points to show how hopelessly unsatisfactory the clause was.

MR. BIRRELL said that the animus of his hon. friend the Member for Louth, which was no doubt genuine, was to be judged by his objection to every line and word in the clause. The discussion showed that the Government were wise to leave the matter to be decided by regulations, though he admitted that the regulations should be within the knowledge of the Committee before they parted company with the Bill. He did not agree with what had been said about the local authorities. He could not imagine that the ballot was to be taken away from the local authorities because someone attributed to them a desire that the result should be of a particular kind which would not require them to give the four-fifths facilities. He did not think that that was a fair way of putting it. The ballot-box, once put into operation, provided that the question put was a proper one, was above all suspicion. That had always been the method of the ballot-box. It did not matter who provided it, the ballot-box was not open to the charge of animus. The question of importance was that in every part of the country the form of the question should be the same, and that in that sense it should be statutory. The noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone had an Amendment in which he gave his own view as to the form of the question which should be put—a very natural, proper and sensible question, viz. :—

> "Do you wish the religious instruction in the school where your children attend to remain of the same character as it is now ?"

But the feeling of the Government was that, if it were possible, the form in which the question was put should be very closely identified with the form of the Statute itself. He did not say that that was absolutely essential, but it was the view of experts. The subject, however, would be most carefully considered, and an opportunity would be given to discuss the form of the question before they parted with the Bill in this House. In regard to the point raised by his hon friend behind him they had always intended that the parent should have as many ballot balls or forms as he had children, so that the parent of six children should have six times the voting power of the parent of one child. Let them hope that six would be the maximum. He was not putting any limit to the fecundity of the population of the country; he only said that the school age was limited from five to thirteen years, and, therefore, that of itself would limit the number of children of any one parent in average attendance at school at one and the same time. Therefore, there was no difficulty in that way. He insisted that this was a question of the children, and not of the parents. It was the number of children in the schools that determined its denominational character. It was not the parents sitting at home: it was not a question of stocks and roots which were more or less prolific; but a question of the number of children in the schools. If he might use language with which he was formerly more familiar than now, they should decide this question per capita and not per stirpes. He fully recognised the absolute necessity that the question to be put should appear in the regulations, and that it should be one and the same question for all parts of the country; and he would see that the regulations were placed on the Table of the House as soon as possible.

*MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) said that the real difficulty underlying this particular part of the subject was the making of regulations on an unstable basis. There could hardly be a more fluctuating and uncertain basis for calculation of the four-fifths than the numbers of children going to a school or leaving it. The parents of four-fifths of the children at a school in August would probably have a very different proportion of the children in September after the summer holidays. What was really wanted to be known was the opinions of a large majority of the parents, not those of their children. The strength of a parent's religious convictions did not depend upon the number of his children at school. The gratuitous introduction of such an extremely unstable basis of calculation of the four-fifths was unfortunate and would lead to unnecessary confusion in a case where the element of stability was very important to prevent the constant recurrence of religious squabbling.

THE CHAIRMAN said that they were now discussing the question of the ballot. The point raised by the hon. Member would come later on.

*MR. VERNEY said that in that case he would reserve his remarks till a later period.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) inquired whether when the word "parents" was used it meant both parents or only one parent; that was to say, was the mother as well as the father included.

MR. BIRRELL said the word meant the responsible parent under the Act of 1870.

SIR E. CARSON pointed out that the Act of 1870 did not give any definition of the word "parents." If the Bill were left as it stood, the matter would be quite open, and this would lead to utter absurdity. Supposing there were six children in the family, would there be six votes; and, if so, who was to exercise them: the father or the mother ?

MR. BIRRELL: One or the other.

SIR E. CARSON insisted that some provision dealing with this matter ought to be inserted in the Bill.

MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) quite agreed that the Committee should take a strong line upon this matter and see that the questions put to parents in regard to voting were intelligible and such as the rural population could understand.

LORD R. CECIL hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would, in dealing with this matter, be guided by his own common sense and would not take the advice of experts. He could not but regret that the right hon. Gentleman had introduced the ballot in this matter, as he thought the scheme was more workable before than since its introduction. Let him put a difficulty which the right hon. Gentleman would see was a real one which would arise under paragraphs (a) and (b). Under paragraph (a) it had to be ascertained that the parents of at least four-fifths of the children attending the schools desired the facilities, and under parargaph (b) it had to be ascertained that there was public school accommodation in schools not affected by a permission given under the section for the children attending the schools whose parents did not desire those facilities. That meant that in taking the vote they had to take into account the number of parents of children who were in favour of the continuance of the facilities in the schools, and then the facilities would be afforded if there was school accommodation for the remainder of the children. Let them take the case of a school in which there was no definite accommodation for any of the children in the matter of religious instruction except with regard to those children whose parents were satisfied with the religious instruction already afforded in the school. Because one parent was lazy and failed to record his vote, were the whole of the other children to be deprived of these facilities? The sub-sections assumed that there must be a unanimous vote. He also wished to ask a question as to an Amendment which appeared on the Paper in the name of the President of the Board of Education. It ran—

> "Where the local education authority refuse to agree to an arrangement offered to them by the owners of the schoolhouse of an existing voluntary school as respects the use of the schoolhouse, and the school is one in respect of which extended facilities could be granted under this section, and are desired, the owners of the schoolhouse may appeal to the Board of Education, and that Board may, if they think fit, after considering the circumstances of the case, and the wishes of the parents of children attending the school as to the continuance of the school with extended facilities, by order, make an arrangement under this Act with respect to the use of the schoolhouse on such terms and conditions as may be contained in the order, including, if thought fit, a condition requiring extended facilities to be afforded, but if under any special circumstances of the case the Board think it expedient, they may, instead of making such an arrangement, make an order allowing the school to continue as a State-aided school. Provided that——"

There was little there about the parents, but the main reference was to the local education authority. How were they going to discover the will of the parent under that proposal? No machinery seemed to be contemplated. The provision seemed to have been inserted to meet the unreasoning fear of the Nonconformists that the parson of the parish was a sort of dragon going about seeking whom he might devour.

MR. BIRRELL said he could not distinguish between reasonable and unreasonable parsons. He could only deal with what he found existing. He had had experience of the class of parson—whom he hoped formed the majority of the clergy of the country—who were the noblest of their species; who were loved by everybody in their parishes, and could do almost anything they liked with everybody in them. He had had experience of that class of parson, but there were other members of the clergy with whom it was almost impossible to get on, as he knew very well as a Nonconformist. As to the noble Lord, what was his first point? It went on the supposition that there would not be public school accommodation for one child.

LORD R. CECIL said that, as he took it, there must be unanimity where there was no other school accommodation.

MR. BIRRELL did not think the noble Lord's fears would be realised having regard to the limits which they had fixed by this clause, namely, that it only applied in urban areas. The argument of the noble Lord as to the injustice was very far fetched. The parents could come in upon the local inquiry, and the conditions of the local inquiry were that at least four-fifths of the parents of the children should desire these facilities. Whether the parents desired them would form part of the inquiry. He had indicated to the noble Lord the other day that he was quite willing to insert words to secure the rights of parents and of the owners of schools to raise the matter when it came to a question of a local inquiry, but the local inquiry necessitated a ballot.

SIR E. CARSON wished to know how they were to ascertain under sub-section (b) if the parents did not desire it.

MR. BIRRELL said the matter was easy enough. They knew the children in the schools and their parents, and the inquiry would show whether four-fifths of the parents desired the facilities or not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not think the right hon. Gentleman appreciated his noble friend's point. It might be arguable whether it was fair to destroy the denominational organisation of a school because one child could not find accommodation for religious instruction in the neighbourhood. The ballot would tell them whether four-fifths of the parents desired denominational teaching, but there was nothing to show that those who abstained from the ballot did not also desire denominational teaching. It was essential, if the Government were to carry out their own plan, to discover not only whether the parents desired accommodation, but whether any of the parents desired accommodation elsewhere. Then abstention might and probably would be a matter to be taken into account. As he understood, what his noble friend desired was that mere abstention from the ballot should not be taken as an indication of a preference for another kind of school.

MR. BIRRELL said he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in this matter. Let them suppose that in a school of 100 children they took a ballot. The ballot showed that the parents of eighty of the children had an active desire for denominational facilities and the parents of twenty did not vote. In that case accommodation must be provided for those twenty children in some other school. They did not desire the facilities. It was the active desire indicated by the vote that showed who desired facilities, and if the parents of the twenty did not care to take the trouble to go to the poll he knew of no other way to deal with the point. The Bill said they could get the facilities and advantages if they showed an active desire, by vote, for them. If they did not vote it must be taken that they did not desire them. Then sub-section (b) said that the eighty could not have their four-fifths facilities unless there was another school in the neighbourhood to which the twenty children who did not desire these facilities might go.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) asked whether it was suggested that a man who was on a bed of sickness and who was in favour of facilities being given was to go and vote, or were they to assume there was unanimity. The fair way to vote would be to put the ' ayes" into one box and the "noes" into another.

MR. DILLON said that the President of the Board had laid down the most astounding doctrine he had ever heard of. The right hon. Gentleman had lately been before a constituency. Supposing the doctrine he had laid down was applied in that constituency would he be willing to count every voter who did not vote as a man who did not want him as a Member? It was precisely the same thing. There were always a certain proportion of men who did not vote in a Parliamentary election, and what the right hon. Gentleman wanted to do in this case was to take all those who did not vote and count them on one side of the issue. A more unfair and astonishing doctrine he had never heard of. Anyone who had had any experience of elections knew perfectly well that a perfect vote was never obtained; that for some reason or other people would neglect to vote. To take everybody who for some reason or other could not vote, the sick, the dying, the absent on a journey, sailors, soldiers, commercial travellers and people of all kinds whose business took them away at the time of voting, and say that they were all to be counted as being against the facilities would turn the whole thing into an absolute mockery, and do a double injustice, because not only would they count those who did not vote as being against the facilities, but their children would be counted as children who would not remain in the schools. A great number would not vote because they belonged to a different religion, and although they had no objection to the facilities would rather see the facilities given without their active co-operation. Yet these people were to be counted as being against the facilities.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) said he thought the hon. Member had entirely misplaced the analogy of the constituency and the election. The issue was not the same. Let them take a school of 100 children. If they had only ten persons going to vote for these facilities, and there were less than two on the other side, that would decide the issue, whereas the clause said "the parents of four-fifths of the children" had expressed a desire for these facilities. It was not a question to be decided by a majority of those who went to the poll, so to speak. That was not the clause. The clause said that they should not have facilities unless the parents of four-fifths of the children desired them. It was a perfectly simple clause. It allowed people with strong views to claim these facilities, and the least those people could do if they desired the facilities was to express their desire by ballot. In a school of 100 children if the parents of eighty of them voted for the facilities they could have them if they showed there was sufficient school accommodation in the district for the twenty children the parents of whom did not desire the facilities. That was as he understood the clause.

SIR E. CARSON said the hon. and learned Member had apparently mistaken the point of his hon. friend. This point was one of real substance. Let the Committee consider the case put by the hon. Gentleman where they had the votes of four-fifths of the parents of the 100 children in the school, and there remained twenty children who might be the children of four parents. Were they going to deprive the children of that school of special facilities because there was no other school in the neighbourhood to which the twenty children could go? Could anything be more monstrous? Supposing they communicated with those who were sick and could not vote and they were found to be unanimously in favour of the facilities, were they going to say that that was a school that should not have facilities? Supposing they had a unanimous school, of which there were many, the second school would not be availed of. Were they going to leave the whole question of facilities to the mere accident of health or absence? That would be not only a wanton absurdity but a monstrous injustice. The clause did not say the parents who did not vote or who happened to be ill or away, but the parents who did not desire these facilities. What they objected to was the right hon. Gentleman setting up new machinery specially for ascertaining whether there were any parents who did not desire these facilities. One ballot at all events would not do for ascertaining two absolutely different questions. Personally he considered the whole question of the ballot in this matter absolutely foolish and inapplicable. But if they adhered to the principle of the ballot they had as much right to obtain accurately the views of those who did not desire the facilities as of those who did, and he suggested it would be much better to have the ballot under (b) than (a). It was much more proper to assume that a man did not vote because he was satisfied with existing arrangements than that he wanted something different. No answer had yet been given to this point. If they left the proposal as it was under the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment they would leave it in a state, not only of absolute confusion, but of absolute injustice. The right hon. Gentleman really must tell them how he was going to ascertain the parents of those who did not desire the facilities.

He could not be satisfied with the assumption that the sick and absent did not desire the facilities. That was not an argument which the right hon. Gentleman would use in any other assembly than the House of Commons. Unless machinery was set up, or the machinery was made applicable only to (b), he hoped his hon. friends on the Opposition side of the House at all events would persist until they got some logical method of determining questions which the right hon. Gentleman had himself raised.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said hon. Gentlemen opposite were making great difficulties about what was inherent in every election. They all knew that persons who did not go to the ballot were ignored in the result of the election; they were not counted either on the one side or on the other. But the Government here had done better than in the case of the ordinary elections. Hon. Gentlemen opposite could have scarcely considered the fact of the public inquiry. The local authority had to settle two problems which he dared say were accompanied in the mode of settlement by some disadvantages. They had first to ascertain whether four-fifths of the parents desired the special facilities. They found that out by means of the ballot. The Government were not making any unreasonable assumption when they said that people who did not take advantage of the opportunity of expressing their desire did not possess that desire. There were no means by which to ascertain the feelings and opinions of people who would not go to vote. The local authority would have fulfilled its duty if it had found out how many persons desired facilities. It had next to consider the case of the persons who had not expressed their desire. For that purpose it had to look round and see whether there was school accommodation for the children of parents who did not desire the facilities. Let them take a case in which eighty parents out of 100 had declared themselves in favour of facilities. The question would then arise whether there was public school accommodation for the children of the twenty non-desiring parents. That was for the local authority to consider. The non-desiring parents might appear at the public inquiry and say that the local authoritty need not trouble very much about the public school accommodation for their children. The Government had gone far beyond the ordinary electoral system in attempting to ascertain the wish of every parent—of those who desired facilities, and then of those who did not. To hear hon. Gentlemen speak about absent and sick parents, one would imagine that a general election must be invalid because a large number of persons entitled to vote were not at the polls. It was absolutely impossible to devise better means to ascertain the public will than the electoral machine, but the Bill supplemented those methods by a public inquiry which would ensure that every substantial body of parents in the area had their wishes expressed.

*MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) said he would give a concrete case. Let them take a school three miles or more from any other school, so that it was impossible to find alternate accommodation, and suppose that the parents of ninety-nine children out of 100 voted for Church of England teaching, but the parent of the remaining child, although a member of the Church of England, was absent, or ill, or for some reason would not vote. In such a case the whole thing would fall to the ground, because it was impossible in the instance he had put to fulfil the condition in sub-section (b). The point which the Solicitor-General put did not meet the difficulty at all. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said there would be a public inquiry at which the dissenting parents or any parent who did not vote could state their views. But this was a case of balloting. Nobody knew, and nobody would be entitled to know, who were the parents who had not voted or what were their opinions. Even supposing that a man did come forward and say that he waived condition (b), there was no provision in the Bill for giving effect to that waiver. The whole thing was unreasonable and unworkable. If there was to be a vote it should be held in such a way as to ascertain not only those who desired the facilities, but those who objected to them, and desired to have other forms of religious instruction.

He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the whole matter.

*THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee were getting a little away from the Amendment regarding the ballot on sub-section (a), and drifting into a discussion on questions which could only be met by Amendments to sub-section (b).

MR. STUART said a great deal of what had been said by hon. Gentlemen was criticism of what did not exist in the clause, although it was intended to be read or introduced into it. As the clause stood the ballot only applied to (a). It had been stated that the position would be ascertained at a public inquiry. If it was intended to be ascertained by ballot it should read "parents who have not expressed their desire to have those facilities."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the hon. Member for Sunderland was mistaken as to the position in which the Committee found itself. The position had been illustrated by two speeches which were wholly inconsistent. The principle laid down by the Minister for Education was that every parent who did not vote in favour of facilities was supposed to be hostile. But that was not the version given by the Solicitor-General, who put forward a new theory, viz., that the proper method was the ballot, and in that way they would discover whether 80 per cent. of the parents did or did not require the facilities. The ballot was good enough for them, but there was another method of discovering those who did not want the facilities. Why was the ballot to be used to investigate the number who did want facilities and the public inquiry to find out the number who did not? Was there ever such an absurd scheme put forward?

SIR W. ROBSON said that was not his statement. He referred to sub-section (b) which laid upon the local authority the duty of ascertaining whether there was public school accommodation in schools not affected by a permission given under the section for the children attending the school whose parents did not desire the facilities.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he thought that point was not in order. It was the business of the local authority by an investigation to discover the number of parents who really wanted their children to go elsewhere. Two methods were deliberately adopted by the Government. There was the ballot for those who desired denominational education and the public inquiry for those who did not. He thought that was ridiculous. The Government must feel that something would have to be done to meet this case. Were 90 per cent. of the children in a school to be deprived of denominational education because 10 per cent. were indifferent? Was that the policy of the Government? If so, could it stand criticism in any assembly which was not bound by the peculiar difficulties under which the Committee were now labouring? Could the Government hold that position for a moment but for the closure? Would they not be driven from it in hopeless rout? They could not support their case by any argument that would hold water before an impartial assembly. Was it, therefore, not advisable that the Government should devise some Amendment in the next few lines which would meet the justice and the equities of the case?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) said he wished to point out what the intention of the Government was in introducing the Bill. Most of the criticism of the Leader of the Opposition had been addressed to the Clause. For what purpose was the parent introduced? Because it was the first condition preceding the granting of these facilities that the parents of at least four-fifths of the children should desire them. The original Bill provided no machinery for this purpose but the local inquiry, and so the Government thought, in the interests of accuracy and to avoid misconceptions, it would be better to determine that question by the machinery now provided. That was the Amendment which was now before the Committee. Then there arose the second of the two conditions on the fulfilment of which the enjoyment of the facilities depended. The right hon. Gentleman had said they were going to ignore the ballot or misuse it in determining that question, but he contradicted that. Prima facie persons who had not expressed their desire by voting in the ballot were persons who might be assumed not to desire it. ["No"] That was only common sense. He did not think it would be right to assume from the fact that a man had not voted that that was conclusive on this point. A man might be away or ill, and there might be a number of reasons which would prevent him from exercising his vote, and for that reason it was very desirable that a public inquiry should be held in order that persons of this kind could come forward.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON: But the ballot follows the local inquiry.

Mr. ASQUITH: Not at all. But if there was any difficulty in that respect it could be put right. It was the intention of the Government that the ballot should be not conclusive proof that there was a four-fifths majority, but prima facie evidence that persons who did not vote "Aye" were persons who were not desirous of extended facilities. The local inquiry was supplementary, and might very well enable the local authority to determine whether or not in such cases as the right hon. Gentleman had now put extended facilities were wanted and could be given.

Mr. BLAKE (Longford, S.) said this was not an ordinary ballot. It was a case in which four-fifths of the whole body of the electors were required to vote in order that the local authority might be induced to take a certain course in regard to the providing of facilities. It was clear, therefore, that the ballot would not represent the whole number of those who desired facilities. By taking a ballot they did not get the opinion of those parents who did not vote on account of sickness, absence on duty, or otherwise, and who always formed a considerable proportion of the whole body of electors. A local inquiry was a more elastic method of ascertaining the views of the parents, because the decision arrived at did not necessarily depend on the presence of every parent who desired to express an opinion as in the case of a ballot. As a rule, almost invariably, there would be a larger number really and genuinely desiring facilities than those whose votes were recorded at the polls. The discussion in its present form was due to the statement which the Minister for Education had made as to the construction to be put on the result of the ballot. What had aroused feeling in the Committee was the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that all the parents who did not, from whatever cause, say "Yes" were to be taken as saying "No." There must be a distinct assurance given that no such view would be taken, otherwise great injustice would be inflicted, and this clause would become less operative for the purpose for which it was said to be intended than anybody could have expected.

Mr. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) said he should like to bring before the Committee a concrete case which took place within four miles of where he lived in an urban district. In connection with a school attended by 300 children there was an inquiry to ascertain the desire of the parents with respect to religious instruction. The question put to them was in the very words contained in the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord, namely—

> "Do you wish the religious instruction in the school which your children attend to remain of the same character as it is now."

The answers were not given under the ballot. All but seven of the parents answered the question in the affirmative, and further inquiry showed that of these seven parents four were Roman Catholics who, though in favour of religious instruction being given in the school, stated that they could not be expected to give their assent to the form of instruction which was given. The other three parents gave no answer, but there was no dissent on their part. This concrete case showed that instances of great difficulty would arise under the ballot. Were they to understand that the accommodation under sub-section (b) which was to be found in schools unconnected with extended facilities would only apply to the children of those who appeared at the public inquiry.

THE CHAIRMAN: Clearly that question does not arise on this Amendment.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said the Committee should have a clear statement from the Government as to what was really meant by ballot under the clause. The opinions of parents should not be judged by the fact of their voting or not voting.

MR. BIRRELL said that the point before him earlier in the afternoon, when he got a little beyond the rules of order, was sub-section (a). He certainly said, and it was a view which was perfectly clear on the reading of the clause itself, that the parents of the children attending the school would have actively to make known their wishes. The fact to be determined under the very wording of the clause was that the parents of at least four-fifths of the children attending the school desired facilities, and if parents did not exercise their vote they could not be said by any possible rule of law, or equity, or common sense, to desire facilities. That was the whole concession of the clause, which was based upon the denominational anxiety of the parents. They were to express actively by vote in the ballot what their wishes were in the matter. Under sub-section (b) a public inquiry was to be held to ascertain whether or not there was sufficient accommodation in the schools for the number of children whose parents did not express a desire for facilities. In that inquiry nothing would be easier than to have evidence afforded that would go to show that parents who had not voted were not desirous of accommodation elsewhere. Parents who had not voted on account of ill-health, or for other reasons, could be represented at the public inquiry held to ascertain whether or not there was public school accommodation for the children who would be excluded by the denominational feelings of their parents from attending the four-fifths schools. A public inquiry would be a very foolish inquiry if it did not deal with the actual facts of the case. So far as sub-section (a) was concerned, he could not withdraw in any way from what he had said—that the only way of indicating a desire to obtain the facilities was by recording a vote.

MR. WYNDHAM said that the proposal of the President of the Board of Education was a totally impracticable one. If it were adopted, an inquiry would in every case destroy any advantage supposed to be gained from the ballot. Unless there were as many votes given as there were children attending the school, there was a prima facie assumption, according to the argument of right hon. Gentleman opposite, that the remainder did not actually desire those facilities and the local authority was to consider whether there was the accommodation needed for the children represented by the absent voters. A 100 per cent. poll was unknown, so that in every case there would be this investigation or inquiry, which would embrace the consideration of why certain parents did not put in their votes. But how were they going to discover who did not vote? They could not have a scrutiny of a ballot of this character. At the local inquiry every man must be asked whether he had voted, and whether he had exhausted the whole of his voting power.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said he had rarely heard a more extraordinary statement than that to which the Committee had just listened. It was based on a misunderstanding of the whole situation both before and after the ballot. Let him recall to the Committee where they stood, and what promises were made by his right hon. friend at the commencement of the debate. His right hon. friend had distinctly stated that the regulations for the ballot—the whole machinery to be adopted—would be placed on the Table of the House before the Bill left the House of Commons. He had pledged himself to that, and yet a couple of hours had been spent in discussing what the regulations ought to be and in putting into his right hon. friend's mouth remarks which he did not make. This hurried on the guillotine more rapidly, and excluded consideration of other matters.

MR. WYNDHAM said that if the right hon. Gentleman wished to charge him with having spoken in order to waste time, he was under a complete misapprehension. He had listened carefully to all that had fallen from the Minister for Education, and he did not think that he had misrepresented him by a single word.

*Sɪʀ HENRY FOWLER repudiated having made any charge against the right hon. Gentleman. What he had said was that the effect of this protracted debate on a detail not before the Committee, and which would come up at a subsequent stage, was a waste of time having regard to the serious questions which remained undiscussed. The whole of these proceedings depended upon the proving of a fact. It was that four-fifths of the parents of the children attending the school desired the school to go on as before. That was the fact to be ascertained; there was no contest. Let them take a concrete illustration. Suppose 100 children attended a school, before the owners of that school could claim that denominational education should be continued as before he must prove that the parents of eighty of the children were in favour of that course. If the fact were not proved there was an end of it. The matter was a very simple one. His right hon. friend would tell the Committee the machinery by which the ballot was to be worked. If the initial fact was proved, then the next stage was the submission of this demand by statutory right to the local authority to consider whether the claim should be granted. One of the terms of the inquiry then to be made was whether there was proper accommodation for the children who would not attend a four-fifths school.

Sɪʀ WILLIAM ANSON said that the Bill provided that there must be a public inquiry before the ballot took place. [Mɪɴɪsᴛᴇʀɪᴀʟ cries of "No, no."]

*Sɪʀ HENRY FOWLER maintained that the initial procedure was to ascertain whether there were four-fifths in favour of the denominational education. It was easy to make paradoxical points regarding cases which did not happen in real life. No local authority having the knowledge that there was accommodation for the children remaining would split hairs in a manner totally contrary to common sense and common judgment. There would be no occasion to argue whether the non-voters were for or against. As to the machinery of the ballot, the local authorities were quite capable, from long experience, of taking a ballot so as to secure absolute impartiality. If the eighty out of 100 were in favour of these facilities being extended they would have to be granted.

Sɪʀ THOMAS ESMONDE suggested that it would be simpler to add an Amendment which would make it perfectly clear that the question should be decided by the parents who voted.

Mʀ. HAROLD COX (Preston) appealed to the Government to ask themselves what their object was in inserting this clause in the Bill. Who was it that they wished to protect? Surely they wished to protect the minority who were not content with the denominational teaching given in the schools. There was no necessity to protect the majority who were content with the existing denominational teaching. They were satisfied with the status quo. The only injustice arose in regard to those who were dissatisfied with the status quo, and therefore they ought to ascertain the feelings of the minority and not of the majority.

Sɪʀ GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) wished to know if he was correct in understanding the right hon. Gentleman to say that his interpretation of the clause was that if four-fifths of the parents of the children attending the school desired them, the facilities would be granted. Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House had always understood that if accommodation was not found for the other fifth, that was to say, for the twenty out of the 100, the four-fifths could not enjoy the facilities.

Mʀ. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) complained that he had not received a sufficient answer to his question whether the word "parents" included the mothers. He would like to have an answer to that question, because it was the most important that could be asked in regard to the Bill. The parents of many of the children were working people and the fathers might be obliged to be absent at the time a ballot was taken. What he wanted to know was whether in such cases the mother of the children would be allowed to give the vote in regard to the facilities.

SIR W. ROBSON said that perhaps he might be allowed to answer the question, which he was sure he did not wish to evade. The ballot would be taken in accordance with regulations to be made by the Board, which would prescribe the method. Prima facie, the word "parent" would mean the father, who was, of course, the guardian of the child, but it would be quite open to the Board to prescribe a means by which the wish of the father could be ascertained by the vote of the mother. All these points would be carefully considered.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose to a point of order, and to clear up the situation wished to know whether it was possible at this stage to raise an Amendment by which the particular matters which the Opposition cared about could be brought to issue. They could not be brought to issue by merely voting for the actual Amendment before the Committee, and if it was not possible to amend that Amendment so as to make the issue a precise one, he would suggest that they should not rely upon this Amendment, but should wait until they arrived at Sub-section (b) to see whether the matter could not be raised in a precise and specific form.

*THE CHAIRMAN said it was not possible to reply to a question regarding an Amendment not before him. Until he saw the Amendment he could not possibly decide upon it. He had no Amendment before him, but undoubtedly many of the objections and criticisms which had been raised would be dealt with by Amendments to sub-section (b).

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that that being so, he thought they would do better not to divide at this point, but that they should raise the question on sub-section (b). Then they could take a division in a more decisive form.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) moved to substitute "a reasonable number of parents" for "the parents of at least four-fifths." He said that the discussion which they had had showed that circumstances might arise which would make it undesirable to have a hard and fast line. There was no virtue in the particular fraction of four-fifths, and a more elastic proposal would remove many difficulties. He did not himself understand upon what ground this particular fraction had been fixed upon, and he thought they were entitled to ask for some explanation. The other day he suggested some considerations which he thought showed that facilities should be granted to a much smaller number than four-fifths of the parents. In Prussia there was a specific provision to the effect that special religious instruction should be given if it was desired for pupils to the number of twelve, which was usually a far smaller number than four-fifths of the whole school. The effect of that provision was that special religious instruction should be afforded if there was a minority of twelve pupils. In our industrial schools special denominational teaching was given in cases where the proportion was much less. At Osborne Naval College, with 420 cadets, special teaching was allowed for eighteen Roman Catholics among them, and he was assured by the authorities that there would be no difficulty in giving special denominational teaching to any cadets of the Free Churches all together. If the right hon. Gentleman's Regulations under the Act were applied to this college, however, these eighteen cadets would not have the instruction they desired. The authorities at Osborne College had told him that no hitch of any kind had occurred, and that there would be no difficulty or interference with discipline in providing special religious instruction for all the three Churches.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): Who said that?

*MR. EVELYN CECIL: The authorities

Dr. MACNAMARA: Who are the authorities?

*Mr. EVELYN CECIL: The commander and the chaplain.

Dr. MACNAMARA: Oh! The chaplain.

*Mr. EVELYN CECIL said the chaplain and those engaged in the work had actual knowledge, and although it might be easy to jeer at the working of the school, without having any knowledge of the actual facts, he put this case forward, not as a conclusive instance, but as one instance where an infinitely smaller figure than four-fifths obtained. But he should like to appeal to the specific statements made by the President of the Board of Education himself. The right hon. Gentleman had given some study to this question in an article in the Independent Review of October, 1903. He there wrote—

> "The parents really must, whether they like it or not, conquer their shyness, and, making their first appearance in this ancient and horrid controversy, tell us, when they send Tom and Jane to school, whether they wish them to receive any, and, if any, what, religious instruction. There is no chance of the multiplication of strange parental religions. We are not an imaginative people. Jews, Roman Catholics, Anglicans, and Dissenters (in a lump) will usually exhaust the list."

He knew that he seemed to be always engaged in bringing up the ghosts of the right hon. Gentleman's former utterances when he had not the honour of sitting in this House or upon the Treasury Bench, and they were the very arguments which were now brought forward by the Opposition. There was no merit in four-fifths, no virtue in it. What if a fluctuating local population made four-fifths possible in one month and not in the next? He ventured to submit to the Committee that it would be much better to accept his Amendment that "a reasonable number" should be substituted for "four-fifths." He suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should make the experiment. If it failed, then another method might be adopted. But there was no reason why it should fail. It had been tried in many cases with success, and in his opinion there was no reason why the Government should not accept the Amendment he now moved.

Amendment proposed—

> "In page 3, line 7, to leave out the words 'the parents of at least four-fifths,' and insert the words 'a reasonable number of parents.'"—(Mr. Evelyn Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

Mr. BIRRELL observed that the hon. Member had quoted from something he wrote years ago. If the hon. Member would take steps that he should occupy in this country an autocratic position with power of issuing a mandamus every one was bound to obey, then he would undertake to deal with this religious question without any assistance or interference from the hon. Member or anybody else in the House. But the measure he was now supporting was a Government measure in which he had a part, but it was a joint operation, and he was not to be debarred by any individual expressions made some years ago, to the general purport and good sense of which, however, he still adhered. The hon. Member did not like "four-fifths." But would the hon. Member be good enough to say what was "a reasonable number?"

*Mr. EVELYN CECIL: To be ascertained in the locality.

Mr. BIRRELL did not call that a reasonable suggestion—that what was a reasonable number was to be ascertained by the local authority or by a jury. In his opinion, Parliament must assume some responsibility in this matter. Parliament must determine the conditions under which these facilities were to be granted. The Government, therefore, had chosen a number which would secure that the school, in order to have extended facilities, must be a school of an overwhelmingly denominational character. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, however, thought that wherever there was a child needing denominational instruction, that child ought to be able to get it under a national system of education. That would be a perfectly rational system, but it was not the scheme of this Bill, and it was not the scheme for which the great majority of the people of this country had voted. The hon. Member must recognise that the Government could not bring in a Bill of that description. What they had done at great pains and labour—ill-requited pains and unrecognised labour—was to introduce this Clause 4. That it was not a perfect denominational clause, he quite agreed. But still, as Dr. Johnson said about the dancing dogs—"It is not a wonder that the dog dances well—the wonder is that it dances at all!" And so with regard to this clause—the wonder was that it should be where it was at all. It was a highly exceptional clause dealing with a highly exceptional circumstance. The main circumstance was that the school to have these exceptional facilities must be beyond all question a clear denominational school. They could not have nice inquiries or fine discriminations; they had to deal coarsely by putting a large number which should prove beyond any doubt that the school was a denominational one. He was there to defend "four-fifths" simply on those grounds. There must be an overwhelming majority if the school was to continue on its way as a denominational school. The Government had constructed the clause for the benefit of schools whose character was overwhelming and not likely to change; and they must adhere to it.

*MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University) said whatever might be said of this fraction, one thing was clear, and that was that the privileges acquired under it were of a most precarious character. The migration of a few families to another quarter of the town would destroy the proportion, all the more because four-fifths of the children were a more unstable quantity than four-fifths of the parents. Again, an influx of undenominational children into a denominational school would have a similar effect. Even a single hostile individual who desired to upset the arrangement could easily disturb the balance by bringing in a batch of children from outside. Then there was the fact that under the Bill the permission could be withdrawn at six months' notice. So that the system was set up upon the shifting basis of a constantly varying fraction, which might be four-fifths to-day and two-thirds to-morrow. He did not believe that the desired end could be attained by any rigid fraction. This four-fifths fraction opened up a new chapter in the history of religious toleration and liberty. It marked the arithmetical point at which parental wishes might assert themselves, and rights of conscience might have a voice. Why should the Government express the principle of toleration in the form of this unheard of fraction? The reason was only too apparent. The arithmetical expression was an evasive expression; it put in the language of arithmetic with seeming mathematical coldness and impartiality what the Government dared not say in plain English. What they meant was that the Church of England was not to participate in the religious liberty that was extended to other denominations; that whereas 75 per cent. of the Church of England schools were to be excluded, the Roman Catholic schools, to the extent of 75 per cent. and more, were to be included. He did not wish to rob the Roman Catholics of a single school which was now in their possession. Those schools had been built by them out of hard-won earnings and from a devoted piety, and they ought every one of them to remain without question. All he said was, let the Church of England have the equality and similar privilege to that which was given to other denominations. He did not think that Irish Members asked for exclusive privileges. He heard the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool recently insist on the claim of all creeds for religious equality. The quarrel of English Churchmen was not with the Members on the Irish Benches, with whom they were in hearty sympathy; their quarrel was with the Government, who resorted to a fraction which was not only evasive, but cowardly, and designed to strike a blow at the Church of England. From another point of view, this fraction inflicted peculiar hardship on the Established Church. The Church had set herself a great national task, before any other denomination had taken up the work of education. She had sought to educate not only her own children, but all others who wished to receive her instruction. If she had not attempted to discharge this national duty, and had not thrown wide her doors to thousands of children of other denominations who wished to partake of that education; if, on the contrary, she had taken a sectarian view of her position, and given an instruction rigidly and exclusively denominational, then she would have come within the privileges of the four-fifths clause. The fact that the Church required a smaller fraction was proof that she had been ministering to the needs of different denominations. The magnitude of her work was the measure of her offence. She was penalised for her comprehensiveness, and put under disabilities because, being the Church of the nation, she had attempted to do a national work.

One more point. The limit of "four-fifths" in this clause taken in connection with the limit of the "urban area" meant the break up of one great portion of the organised religious life of England. He knew that hon. Gentleman opposite were not inclined to look upon the voluntary schools in this light. They thought of them, absurd as was the idea, as turning out little seminaries for expert theologians. But there was another side of these voluntary schools which ought not to be ignored. The children there learnt that they belonged to a religious community, that they were members of a body; and in later years surely it was no small thing when one thought of their lonely and unsheltered lives in the great industrial centres, of their isolation and temptations, that they should be able to feel that they were members of a spiritual family, and that they had behind them a great background of fellowship and organic life, and all those mutual aids which to young people were the greatest possible help towards right living. Hon. Gentlemen opposite said, "Children cooped up in denominational pens—how can they become good citizens"? To him the argument was quite the opposite. To train the sense of corporate life was in itself a great education in citizenship, and on the whole those who were most loyal to their own denomination proved also most true in their allegiance to the community. From the point of view of the State and of its moral welfare, he maintained that they could not afford to loosen the ties that bound people to the religious organisations to which they belonged, and the words now under discussion did tend to loosen and to dissolve that vital bond.

Mr. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) said he could tell the Minister for Education what a reasonable number was. It seemed to him that one-half was distinctly a reasonable number. The limit in the Bill allowed considerable advantages to Roman Catholics, but it also inflicted considerable disadvantages on the Church of England. Grievances which were peculiar to the Church of England were not receiving the same attention from the Government that other grievances were, and he asserted that their grievances would not be attended to unless they pointed out that Roman Catholics had serious grievances in this matter too. He thought the limitation distinctly excluded from the operation of the clause a great majority of the schools of the Church of England. Many Members had hoped that under this clause they would see the redemption of the pledges made by Ministers up and down the country, but every Amendment was being rejected and every shred of hope taken from them. They were left in the position, if this limitation were passed, that a large number of their schools had only obtained the so-called miserable advantages under Clause 3. They were placed under a serious disadvantage. They could not in view of the great majority against them protest effectively in this House. They must leave it to another place, if they thought fit, to remodel this clause until the elements of justice appeared in it. The arbitrary limitation was absolutely unjustified, and he hoped it would suffer the fate it deserved, at the hands either of this or of some other Parliament.

Mr. POWER (Waterford, E.) could not under stand why the Government was so wedded to this clause. According to the hon. and learned Member for South Longford, it would ruin no less than 235 of the Catholic schools as they at present existed. He at first thought that that was rather an exaggeration, and he had taken the trouble to visit three schools in the neighbourhood in which he lodged.

Those three visits more than confirmed the accuracy of his hon. and learned friend's statement. The first school was in Kensington Square, kept by Catholic nuns. It was a small school with only 114 children on the roll, and out of that number there were twenty-eight Protestants. Therefore, although the school had been built with Catholic money for the education of Catholic children, it would cease to be a Catholic school, because if it came to a question of voting, a number of the parents of the children would decline to vote. Consequently there would not be the majority necessary to enable the school to be continued as at present. The second case he inquired into was at Fulham. He had also visited the schools connected with the Oratory Church. He took those schools because they were the nearest to him. They were very large schools built at a cost of £20,000. In the girls' school there were 165 girls, and twenty-two of them were not Catholics; whilst there were 180 in the infants' school, forty-five of them not being Catholics. That gave sixty-seven of these children as non-Catholic, and applying the four-fifths rule these big schools, built largely by the pence of the poor, would cease to be Catholic schools, and they would be giving a kind of education there which was never intended by the founders. The first duty of the State was to see that a proper education was given to all classes of the community, and if the State failed in that respect it failed in regard to one of its most important functions. They believed in a Catholic atmosphere in the schools because they believed that it had a good influence on the minds of the young. He maintained that unless the proposed fraction was altered, they would be doing a great injury to the poorest of the poor. The people of this country never did understand Catholic tenets and principles, but Catholics were proud of the sacrifices made in the past by the poor people who had gone before them. They hoped to be able to keep the schools created by those who had been expelled from their own country, and every effort would be used to secure the perpetuation of schools founded by the self-sacrifice of their own countrymen. Hence they would oppose this four-fifths clause.

LORD MORPETH said they had been told that this was an honest Bill. Although many hon. Members on the Ministerial side had declared that they were anxious to give genuine facilities to those who desired definite religious teaching, nevertheless many barriers were interposed between that promise and its realisation. So many difficulties had been placed in the way that in many cases it would be impossible to obtain such teaching. Four-fifths was an exceedingly high proportion. The Minister for Education had asked what was a reasonable proportion. At any rate he should say that it ought to be less than four-fifths, but he was in favour of leaving the matter to the local authority to determine. He was aware that some hon. Members regarded local authorities with a certain amount of suspicion, but his experience of them was that they were far more tolerant than the majority on the Ministerial side of the House. There was hardly a local authority in the country that would refuse to give the facilities permitted by this Bill, and even more than was proposed by the Government. The local authority upon which he had the honour of serving had through the County Council Committee asked that the limitations in Clause 4 should be struck out. He felt sure that if the question was left to the local authorities they would give a far more liberal-minded interpretation than the Government had done. Why not leave it to the local authority to determine whether there was a genuine demand to continue the denominational nature of the school? According to the law as it stood it had not in the past been in the power of denominational schools to refuse to admit the children of other denominations, and for that reason there were in the Catholic and Anglican schools of Great Britain a good many children who did not belong to those particular churches. Would it not be a great hardship upon those churches, which had been doing the work of the State and educating the children of all classes who were sent to them, if they were penalised and told under this Bill that they were not to give definite religious teaching in these schools? All those who had had any experience of administering education before the year 1902 knew that although the children might be sent to any school in which places were vacant, yet in Roman Catholic schools those places were not always considered available, and school boards were allowed to build extra schools, although at the time there were places available in the Catholic schools. With regard to the Church of England schools no such considerations held good, and they had a large number of children who did not belong to that church at all. He thought that fact alone ought to induce the Government to give a generous recognition of these services, and not to insist upon placing the proportion so high as four-fifths. Accordingly, he was in favour of leaving to the local authorities the definition of "a reasonable number," feeling assured that it would be fixed by them at less than four-fifths.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND hoped the Government would yield so far at least as to substitute "three-fourths" for "four-fifths." He had the fullest confidence in the desire of the Minister for Education to do what was reasonable and fair, but surely it was not fair or reasonable to say that unless four-fifths of the children attending a denominational school were of its particular denomination the religious character of the school should be entirely changed? He thought the President of the Board of Education ought to make some Amendment which would safeguard these schools against an undoubted injustice. He did not see anything particularly magical in the fraction four-fifths. If the vote did not show four-fifths, would the Solicitor-General say that it was a fair and reasonable thing that the whole character of the school should be altered, and that the opinion of the great majority of parents should be ignored? He firmly believed that it was the intention of the President of the Board of Education to deal perfectly frankly and fairly by the denominational schools in this matter, and to keep them denominational if the great majority of the parents wished it. His point was that it would be a monstrous thing in regard to a Catholic school, where there were nearly four-fifths who desired that extended facilities should be given, that the facilities should be refused simply because there were five or six votes less than the required number. The words "a reasonable number of parents" in the Amendment might not be the proper words to use. They were very vague, and might give rise to a great deal of trouble, but he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to take some step in order that Catholic schools which were very nearly up to the four-fifths should not be penalised because of the absence of a voter here and there, and because the schools had so recommended themselves that the children of parents belonging to other denominations were sent to them. There were many such schools, conducted by nuns and under the supervision of priests, where there were numbers of Protestant children, on the clear and honourable understanding that nothing should be done to change their religion—an understanding always most scrupulously carried out. He asked the Minister for Education to see whether it was not possible to insert some Amendment which would prevent this hard-and-fast provision from excluding from extended facilities schools which were serving their purpose properly, not only in the eyes of Catholics, but in the eyes of a considerable number of Protestants as well. Reference had been made to what mysterious people in "another place" were going to do to this Bill. He dissociated himself entirely from hon. Gentlemen above the gangway on the Opposition side who were always threatening the Government in that way. It was an intolerable thing that the representatives of the people should be threatened and badgered as to what was going to be done in another place. He did not like it at all, but if a reasonable thing was not done here, undoubtedly it would be done in another place. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to safeguard these schools against an undoubted injustice, and do nothing to bolster up another place.

Mr. BIRRELL assured the hon. Gentleman that he most firmly believed that the Protestant parents who sent their children for well-defined comprehensible reasons to Roman Catholic schools because of their praiseworthy excellence would be found among those who would vote for those schools continuing to be conducted as before. A child of his own attended for many years a Roman Catholic school; he received the utmost kindness there; and he looked back upon the time he spent there, and always would do, as among the happiest periods of his life. He was now in New Zealand, and, as far as he could discover, he was to-day the strongest of Protestants. If while his child was there he himself could have been called upon to exercise the referendum, he should certainly have expressed his opinion at the ballot box that the school should continue as it was, unaltered in any respect. Therefore, he could not agree that Protestant parents would abstain from expressing their opinion in the like sense as opportunity should arise. He agreed that it would be a great miscarriage of justice if a school was deprived of facilities under this clause by reason of the fact that a number of children who belonged to another denomination went to it. As to the four-fifths, he could not in any way go back upon what he had said. The greatest possible pressure had been put upon him by persons whose views he did not share, who had pointed out that the number of Anglican schools that would be benefited under this provision was very large. He did not mind how large it was. The number of actual schools that would fall within the purview of this clause was much more numerous in the case of the Church of England than in that of the Church of Rome. It was with that object they wanted Clause 4 to operate as widely as possible within the limits which appeared on the Bill as drafted. He could not hold out any hope that the proportion would be reduced.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) said he doubted very much whether the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford would derive much comfort from the interesting personal experience which had just been related by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education, and which led him to believe that Protestants attending Catholic schools would after this Act was passed go out of their way to ask that exceptional treatment should be given to those schools. All he could say was that that seemed to indicate to him a great amount of religious liberality and toleration, but not any very strenuous Protestantism.

MR. BIRRELL: Why not? If any person for whom I am responsible is sent to a Catholic school, I do not know that that interferes with my position.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he dared say not. He always understood that the object of establishing a denominational and especially a Church school was to promote in the minds of the children an attachment to the denominational religion for which the school had been created. When the right hon. Gentleman spoke as to his readiness to accept for his own children Roman Catholic teaching, would he in the event of this Bill being passed petition that the Roman Catholic teaching should be continued in the school? He confessed he did not know on what authority the right hon. Gentleman could imagine that there would be no tampering with the Protestant faith of his son in a Catholic school. On the contrary he should have thought that the mere atmosphere of the school would have tended to sap the Protestant faith of his son.

MR. BIRRELL: It did not have that result on my son.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he should doubt whether that son was, as they were told, a very strong Protestant.

MR. BIRRELL: A good Protestant.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he doubted very much whether the son would support the policy which was now supported by his father. But this seemed to him to be rather humorous than serious.

MR. BIRRELL: There is nothing humorous about it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said it did not afford to his mind an assurance that the people who attended these denominational schools and did not agree with the denominational teaching in them would go out of their way to ask that the denominational teaching should be continued. He did not think that any such argument as that could be sustained even if supported by the personal experience of the right hon. Gentleman. At the same time let him say to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford that they on the Opposition benches entirely understood his position. He had made it perfectly clear that the Irish Party did not care for the Anglican case, but for their own case, which they were specially called upon to defend.

*MR. BYLES: Are you an Anglican?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN asked what had that got to do with it? He was puzzled to know in what possible way the hon. Gentleman made that observation relevant to the argument.

*MR. BYLES: I asked for information as to in what way you differentiate what you call "our case" from the case of the Roman Catholics.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he perfectly understood that the hon. Gentleman and the Irish Nationalist Party differentiated the cases, and that while they argued for their own position they did not carry the argument so far as to include the case of those who desired Protestant denominational teaching. They on that side of the House were more liberal, because all they asked for themselves they were ready to concede to Roman Catholics and other denominations.

MR. DILLON: Clause 3 is of no use to us. [Cries of "Oh."]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said that what he was arguing for now was the inclusion in Clause 4 of all schools which were proved to be denominational, whether Catholic or Anglican. What the Opposition asked for was justice and full reciprocity on the part of the Irish Members. The great importance of this discussion was the light it showed on the genesis of the Bill. For himself, speaking as a Unitarian, he said that he was not one of those who had ever attached the great importance so many of his friends did to denominational teaching. He had said in public and in this House that he had never taken exception to the ordinary teaching given under the Cowper-Temple clause. He must say that with such experience as he had had of the working classes of the country he thought the great bulk of them were not so greatly interested as many people imagined in what was called sectarian teaching. That was not a new statement on his part. But if that experience of his was accepted to that extent perhaps his experience would be accepted a little further. There was one thing on which they might always appeal to the democracy of this country, and that was the eternal principles of common justice. He opposed this Bill because he thought that it was unjust, and there was no clause of it which was more distinctively unjust than Clause 4; and no part of the clause was more unjust than the particular limitation of the four-fifths provision which had been ingeniously introduced in order to include the Catholic and exclude the Anglican schools. Did hon. Members think that when, sooner or later, this matter was again carried to the country—as it would be—they could persuade those who cared nothing whatever about denominations that it was a just arrangement which allowed to Catholic schools in the proportion of three-fourths certain privileges which were withheld from Anglican Protestant schools? If they did, they would find themselves very much mistaken. But there was another injustice. The reason the Government were making for the exceptions to Clause 4 was that there were a number of parents who desired denominational teaching—Catholic or Anglican. How could they justly say that because a man sent his children to a school where 80 per cent. were of one denomination the children should have the religious instruction the parents desired, but that it should be denied if only 79 per cent. were of that one denomination? He was sure that the men in the street, who, after all, dictated the policy of the country, would not support such an injustice. They would say that there must be some intention quite different from that which was avowedly on the face of those proceedings. The hon. Member for Cambridge University had put with great force the peculiar hardship of some denominational schools that were to be punished because of their liberalism and generosity to others outside those for whose special benefit the schools had been built. He would give an illustration of which he personally knew the facts. A large denominational school had recently been built at great expense entirely for denominational purposes—Church of England—and in that school one-third of the pupils were Nonconformists. Therefore that school would not come within the four-fifths provision, although there were board schools, Wesleyan schools, and Roman Catholic schools all round. The Nonconformist pupils only went to the Church of England school because the secular education was better there than in the others. He was not blaming them in the least, but under this clause the fact that those pupils chose to go to this denominational school would deprive it of the benefits of Clause 4. That was unjust. Supposing the managers of the school, knowing what would happen, were to say before the Bill passed that they would no longer accept the Nonconformist children in the Church school? What would be the result? Some of the parents would recognise the justice of that decision and would send their children to the public elementary or the Nonconformist school. Others might appeal to the Board of Education and claim that their children should be received in schools in which religious instruction was given of which they disapproved. Could the Board of Education in justice force these children back into the Church schools, and six months afterwards allow the parents of these children to vote against the continuance of the instruction for which the school was established? The proposition in the Bill was absolutely indefensible. No such policy could possibly afford a permanent settlement. He did not threaten hon. Members with what might happen elsewhere, but sooner or later the Government would have to go to the people who, they said, had given them their mandate. He should like very much to have that opportunity. Dr. Clifford, whose personal acquaintance he did not enjoy, but who appeared to speak of him generally by his Christian name, said at a public meeting the other day, "They all knew what Joey wanted." He was not certain that Dr. Clifford knew all that he wanted, but he was quite right if he thought he wanted a general election on this point as soon as possible. He almost challenged hon. Members to agree with him that the result of such an election would not constitute anything like unanimous approval of a policy which on the face of it was unjust, unreasonable, unfair, and could not be defended.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.) said the provisions of the Bill were very drastic, and it seemed to him that under them these schools would be diverted from the main object for which they were built. Those who were responsible for them would be denied the just right to give that religious teaching to which those attending the schools had always been accustomed. A great deal had been said about the safeguards which were going to be given to the voluntary schools under this clause, but when they came to be considered they appeared to him to be absolutely illusory. It seemed to him that the proportion of four-fifths could apply only to schools where the children in attendance were all of one denomination. In other cases the minority would be able to prevent any denominational teaching at all being given. He could very well imagine how, if this Bill became law, there would be no more denominational teaching. The right hon. Gentleman and his supporters denied that the Bill was an attack upon the Church of England. He could only say that he wished that they on the Opposition side of the House could avoid believing that it was such an attack. But what other conclusion could they come to if this proportion of four-fifths was persisted in? The Church of England had many schools, and in numbers of them there were children of all denominations, but unless four-fifths of the parents of the children desired it denominational teaching could not be given. He felt sure that this provision would exclude denominational teaching from hundreds if not thousands of Church schools. Surely where the parents of half the scholars desired to have denominational religious instruction it should be given as before. Eighty per cent. was too large a percentage, and if it was persisted in in one school the children there would get denominational teaching, while in another of a precisely similar character they would not obtain it, although the children of the Anglican denomination constituted the great majority of the children attending it. He thought the clause was built upon a very shifting foundation. There were cases, moreover, in which, although the schools might obtain the privilege at first, shortly afterwards the four-fifths might be reduced to three-fourths, and they would lose the right of giving denominational religious teaching. The percentage was so great that it appeared to him to be altogether unreasonable, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to insert the fraction of one-half, or if he could not do that, something more reasonable than four-fifths.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.) in moving to insert after the word "schools," in line 8, the words "whose parents voted in the ballot," said that his object was to remove the difficulty which arose previously when the right hon. Gentleman explained the principle of the ballot and the method by which the decision should be arrived at. The right hon. Gentleman's suggestion was that they should reverse the usual practice in all matters of election and allow the question to be decided by those who did not vote. When a question was to be decided by ballot it seemed to him a contradiction in terms to say that the decision should be arrived at by those who took no part in it. The proposals of the clause meant that the status of the schools would be altered. That being so, he thought that those who desired to alter their status should have the courage of their convictions and vote for the change. He begged to move.

"In page 3, line 8, after the word 'schools,' to insert the words 'whose parents voted in the ballot'."—(Sir Thomas Esmonde.)

Question proposed "That those words be inserted."

MR. DILLON said the Solicitor-General had just now stated that if a voter did not go to an election he was ignored. That was just the point. If a man did not vote he should not be regarded, and that was the exact purport of the Amendment. When an election took place for this purpose those who did not vote ought to be treated as non-existent, and the only parents they had a right to consider when they adopted the method of the ballot were those who voted. The Amendment was the logical consequence of the ballot. As the clause originally stood there was provided a perfectly elastic method of inquiry which might be presumed to be an exhaustive inquiry as to the views of the parents. There was nothing in the clause to prevent the local authority taking a week or a fortnight to discover the views of the parents or to give time to those who were absent or sick to have their views ascertained. But when they introduced a ballot which must take place between certain specified hours and in a certain specified place they altered the whole condition of the problem and increased against those who demanded facilities the necessary proportion, because in order to produce at the ballot a proportion of four-fifths it would be necessary to have five-sixths or seven-eighths of the voters to secure the four-fifths if the whole of the parents were to be taken into account. He gathered from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that it was the intention of the Government to count as against the granting of facilities everybody who did not vote. He himself thought the proportion of those who would be unable to vote at a given time would be exceedingly large. Workmen were not masters of their own time. A man engaged in the building trade might be at the other end of the country on a job. He could not see that the right hon. Gentleman had advanced a single argument in favour of his project of counting all those who did not vote as against these facilities. Would it not be more just and more generous to count them as in favour of the facilities. That would, he thought, be far more reasonable, because those who objected to them would be sure to come up and record their objection. Therefore, if those who did not vote were to be counted at all, they should be counted as being in favour of the clause. That, however, was not the Amendment before the Committee. The Amendment of his hon. friend imported common sense into this question and only said that if resort was made to the ballot the question should be governed by the ordinary laws of the ballot.

MR. BIRRELL said that the effect of this Amendment had been discussed some time ago, and another Amendment was to be moved on sub-section (b). He was sorry that there was this difference of opinion. He had never assumed that it would arise, because he thought that the point was perfectly plain. The Committee was not dealing with an ordinary election, but with a clause which imposed on certain persons, if they were anxious to obtain special facilities, the duty of accurately expressing their desire that these special facilities should be granted. He now saw that hon. Members opposite took another view. The essence of the matter was that these additional facilities should be obtained by an active expression of a desire on the part of the parents, and, therefore, it was not possible for the Government to accede to the Amendment. He agreed that every precaution must be taken to see that the wishes of the parents were expressed and that it would be a monstrous thing that, because a man was absent from home, the mother, who was looking after the children, should not have the right of representing him in the ballot. It was intended that the mother should have this right, and he hoped that there would be no difficulty about that point. The only other point of hardship was that a certain number of parents might have been prevented from expressing their opinions, and that it would be wrong to assume that such parents insisted upon having accommodation for their children elsewhere. Until he saw the Amendment that was to be moved he would content himself by saying that words could be inserted to make it plain that at the public inquiry any parent who did not vote in the ballot would have an opportunity to be represented and to indicate that he had no desire for accommodation for his child. The authority in charge of the public inquiry would be able to deal with the actual facts of the case, and would be able to ascertain what public accommodation was needed. But he adhered to the view he had always expressed, that there was an obligation imposed on the parents to make known their desires, and they could not assume in that respect that silence gave consent.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said the President of the Board of Education expected from human nature what had never occurred in the whole history of mankind. Wherever voting took place and under whatever circumstances it took place there would always be a large percentage of voters who would not trouble to record their opinions. He took the case of the electoral contests in the north of Ireland. He doubted whether there was any place in the world where there was such a fanatical desire on the part of men to record their votes Let them take West Belfast, for instance, which was one of the great electoral battle grounds on the north of Ireland. Had 100 per cent. of the electors ever recorded their votes there? He believed the record on one occasion was 96 per cent. and everybody thought that a perfect marvel. Now the right hon Gentleman proposed that not 90 or 95 per cent. but 100 per cent. of the people must record their votes on this question on one side. The minority was more likely to be indifferent than active. The Minister for Education was aware that the number of Protestant children in the Catholic schools was large. When in Wales the other day, in the very heart of the Nonconformist country, he was told there was a Catholic school which had many Protestant children attending it. Therefore they were face to face with this extraordinary situation, that because a Catholic school rightly or wrongly attracted a large number of Protestant children the Catholic parents must vote 100 per cent. while the Protestant parents were not called upon to vote. He thought the proposition had only to be stated in order to show its absurdity. It was perfectly reasonable that the desire for additional facilities should be genuine and active, but between that and the statement that every single one in favour of these additional facilities must vote and would vote was the gap between human nature according to the dreams of the romancer and human nature in reality. A French statesman once said that the majority of men were either sluggards, cowards, or rogues. He would not accept the proposition, but he thought inactivity and apathy were very strong attributes of human nature. The Protestant parents were more likely not to vote than to vote. The Minister for Education seemed rather to admire the Protestant parent who sent his child to a Roman Catholic school, but there were two points of view in regard to that. He should certainly not advise the Catholic parent who had the opportunity of sending his child to a Catholic school to send it to a Protestant school. That would show an ignoble view of the highest considerations of religion. Therefore, so far as this Protestant minority was concerned, they began with a number of people who were indifferent in the matter of religious feeling, and that being so, the probability was in favour of their not voting and the more difficult it would make the case for the Catholics. No man felt more strongly than he did the extraordinary spirit of sacrifice Catholics in this country had made for the erection of their schools, and they would make every effort to retain them. But to say that 100 per cent. would vote was too much. The proposal of his hon. friend was a fair compromise. Let the test be the number of parents who actually voted.

Lord BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) said the Opposition were ready to support the Amendment which had just been placed before the Committee. He really thought that the position taken up by the President of the Board of Education was quite untenable. They were not dealing with an ordinary election. In this case if any person failed to vote, for whatever reason, whether apathy, illness, or absence, that fact would militate against facilities being granted. They could not but remember that in the old days of the School Board elections the average poll was 25 per cent. In 1902, when it was proposed to substitute another authority for the school boards, it was said that the reason why the large balance of the electors did not record their votes was that they were satisfied, and that they did not think it necessary to record their votes. He did not think the parents of other denominations who sent their children to Catholic or Church of England schools would care to state in writing whether they approved of the Roman Catholic or the Church of England creeds or vice versa. He felt sure that those parents would not desire to state on paper whether they approved of those doctrines or not.

Mr. BIRRELL: There is no question of dogma in it at all. The questions put to the parents will not involve in any form religious beliefs.

Lord BALCARRES said he was glad to have that assurance. This provision required not merely an 80 per cent. majority of those actually voting, but substantially a unanimous vote of everybody concerned before the facilities could be obtained, and that was really a very great hardship on those who wished to maintain denominational teaching. The President of the Board of Education had stated, "We all desire that these facilities, if they are facilities at all, shall be real and not a sham." He felt that the limitations were so serious and onerous that the facilities offered under such conditions really would be of very small avail, if not entirely useless.

*MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) said he did not think that the Catholic Church need feel any grave anxiety on account of this particular provision in rural districts. The district which he represented had in it five Catholic schools and four of them were small village schools which would not be affected. The only urban district which would be affected had a Catholic school with only thirty-four children. The singular thing was that the four Catholic schools in the four villages which would be affected by Clause 3 had each a larger number of Catholic children than the school in the urban district which would come under the purview of this clause. So that in regard to this clause which was intended to benefit the Catholic Church the practical effect would be that four of the schools would get no benefit at all, and the urban district school with thirty-four children in attendance would alone benefit. He did not, however, think it would be any use giving the protection of the ballot, and then encouraging a lot of people to make an inquiry to discover how they had voted, or even to discover whether they had voted or not. It would not be in accordance with the principle of the ballot if they allowed a canvass to discover whether they had voted or not in order that their views might be submitted to some local inquiry. The clause was extremely unpopular and would cause no end of trouble.

MR. SHACKLETON said his only fear was that they were going to have far too much for and against upon this question. It would be a very dangerous thing to have a state of things under which the electors would have to decide for or against a Church or a Catholic school. All this appeared to him to be absolutely unnecessary. The groundwork of the Bill, as he understood it, was to have ordinary schools under the Cowper-Temple principle. Clause 4 granted an exception in regard to schools which could prove that they had four-fifths of the parents in favour of facilities. If such a question was put in his district he should not vote at all, because he did not want the exception, and that appeared to him to be a reasonable position to take up. If only those voted under this clause who were required to express an opinion then a majority of 80 per cent. would settle the question. That to him was a common-sense reading of the proposal. The Minister for Education had never said that the other 20 per cent. should be deducted, although he did say that the number who did not vote would be an indication that they did not want those facilities. At the public inquiry, if any parent could show that he was absent for any just reason which prevented him voting, and that he was in favour of this clause being made operative, no public authority would refuse to take his vote. The position would be that he would have to prove that he was unable to register his vote on the occasion when the ballot was taken. Certainly a register should be kept of those who had voted.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster) said this was really the right place for an Amendment of this kind to come in. The Minister for Education had suggested postponing it to another part of the clause; but it was necessary to define what was meant by the words "the parents of four-fifths of the children," and the Amendment did that. The hon. Member for the Clitheroe Division seemed to think that it was a very simple matter, but he would put this question to him: Supposing there was a law or regulation which said that a grant of money by a local authority for certain purposes must be sanctioned by a two-thirds majority, would that mean two-thirds of those voting or two-thirds of the whole body?

MR. SHACKLETON: That is for and against—a different thing altogether.

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS: Not at all. The question is: Does it mean two-thirds of the whole local authority, or two-thirds of the members who vote?

Mr. SHACKLETON: Two-thirds of the people who vote, certainly.

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS said the hon. Member had answered that it meant two-thirds of the people who voted. That was exactly what the supporters of the Amendment wished to have. Four-fifths of the parents—he used the shortest phrase—should be defined as meaning four-fifths of the parents who voted on the question. That appeared to him to be the only fair way of getting at an accurate estimate which would enable a decision to be come to. He would venture to give the Committee an illustration, drawn from his own experiences. Some years ago before the extinction of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he was engaged in a project of public benefit, which required a large sum of money. This had to be obtained from various public sources, and all the contributions were made dependent on a contribution from a vestry. They carried the proposal by a two-thirds majority of those present, and voting at a meeting of the vestry. Then it was objected that a two-thirds majority, not of those voting, but of the whole vestry, was required to sanction the expenditure. The law left the matter in doubt, and for want of a clear definition of the words "a two-thirds majority" the whole project was hung up for some time. He submitted that no such doubt ought to attach to this clause, and therefore he supported the Amendment. He could not find any logical reason put forward by the Government for treating the ballot in this matter on different lines from the ballot in every other matter in which it was resorted to in this country. As to the remarks of the Solicitor-General, they only led to the conclusion that we ought to amend our electoral system so that in future a candidate should be elected to this House by the majority of the constituency and not by the majority of those who voted. That was the principle applied in this Bill, and it seemed to him altogether unreasonable, illogical, confusing and likely to leave a legal doubt about the meaning of the words.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said he was certain that, so far as Catholics were concerned, the matter was of such importance that the vote would be exhaustive; but he thought the Amendment of his hon. friend should be supported, not because it was required, but to safeguard cases of what would be undoubted hardship and injustice if a man who was unable to register his vote was to be regarded as opposed to what in reality everyone knew he desired. When he was in Australia last year one of the things most largely commented upon to the detriment of the Labour Party there was that a small percentage of the electors went to the poll, and it was assumed that those who did not take the trouble to vote were against the Labour Party. Nothing could be more untrue. The vast majority of those who did not vote were in sympathy with the Labour Party, and they did not go to the poll because of the distance, or because it was unnecessary to swell the majority, or because they were prevented from voting by the conditions of their ordinary everyday life. The proposition here laid down, that a man who did not vote for a proposition must necessarily be against it, was a new and dangerous doctrine, and he did not subscribe to it. The Government wanted to put the Catholic elector in this position. If he was prevented from registering his vote at a stated time and place, he was to be regarded as against the suggestion that the religion in which he believed should be taught to his children in the school. It was an unfair suggestion, and one which would work with great injustice in the case of many people. The Government ought to reconsider the matter. What could be fairer than the Amendment which said that the votes which were cast should count, and that the votes which were not cast should not count? He did not know why the Government should lay down the astounding proposition that every man who did not register his vote must be taken to be against the proposition voted on.

MR. GARDNER (Berkshire, Wokingham) said there had been some confusion in the discussion. They were not to have a ballot at all. They were to have a mixture of open voting and ballot voting. Moreover, the parents were not counted, but the children. The vote in the ballot was to be valued according to the number of children a parent had in the school. The result would be very curious. In a school of 200 children, if ten parents, each with four children, did not vote, it would vitiate the whole election, and the rest of the parents could not have what they wanted. The only way out of the difficulty was that those who wished to express their opinion as to what should be done should give their votes personally, and only their votes should be counted.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) said he understood that the whole tendency and meaning of the clause was to give to the parents representing four-fifths of the children attending the school an opportunity of secretly registering their request for special facilities. He did not understand that there was to be a canvass of all the parents to ask them to give a vote for or against, because that would breed bad feeling. It was a subject which ought not to be under discussion in any shape or form. The Amendment was absolutely absurd.

MR. H. R. MANSFIELD (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said he could not see what good the ballot was to be if it was only to register "for," and not "against." He himself had seen letters which had been sent to parents by their children from school, saying that it was the desire of the Government to get rid of the Bible out of the schools and asking the parents to vote against any such decision. He believed any amount of influence would be brought to bear on parents not to vote against. That was pernicious, and that was why they wanted the ballot to enable the people, under the secrecy of the ballot, to vote for or against the proposal. If all those who did not vote were [to be brought up to a public inquiry to give their reason as to why they did not vote, then indeed there was an end of the ballot. He hoped the Government would continue the policy of the ballot right through to the end, and that they would not weaken. Some Members of the Ministerial Party viewed with alarm the concessions already made; they had all gone one way, and he hoped that the right of the parents to speak by the ballot, without the eye of the clergyman or the trustees being upon them, would be preserved.

SIR W. ROBSON said he wanted to say a word on the functions of the inquiry which was to be held after the ballot had taken place. There were two elements to be ascertained—not only the wishes of the parents in regard to facilities, but also the number of parents who desired other accommodation. The number of absentees from the ballot would be smaller than the number usual in an ordinary election, the regulations being drawn up for the purpose of giving every opportunity for the wishes of parents to be ascertained. So much did the noble Lord the Member for Chorley fear that his co-religionists would not come up to the ballot, that he said that if this Amendment were not passed the facilities given to the Church of England schools would be worthless. According, then, to the opinion of the noble Lord, the parents in the Church of England did not care for the facilities.

LORD BALCARRES said he gave most emphatic repudiation to that remark.

SIR W. ROBSON said that the noble Lord could not deny that that was the effect of his words. He had got the words down. Let the Committee consider what the effect of them was. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in speaking of denominational schools made a statement with which they were all familiar, but he doubted very much whether the country and the Committee had weighed its importance. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had no sympathy with those who laid stress upon ordinary facilities. That was an attitude which seemed to be shared by the hon. Member for East Mayo, who said that the ordinary facilities were of no advantage to them, but they must have distinct facilities.

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, therefore, sympathised with those who said that the ordinary facilities were of no use, because he said that what the denominationalists desired was not merely the teaching of their special creeds, but that there should be something mysterious, unstable and intangible, which formed the atmosphere of the school and which they wished to preserve.

Lord R. CECIL rose to order and asked if this argument had anything to do with the Amendment.

Sir W. ROBSON said he would not pursue the matter further if the noble Lord objected, especially as he felt that he was taking up time which might be used by Members of the Opposition. All that he would say was that they had also to consider this "atmosphere" in regard to the minority. They had to consider it not only in regard to the four-fifths, but also in regard to the one-fifth, who, it seemed, were ex hypothesi to be kept in an atmosphere which was dangerous to their creed.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said that those children could go to places where their own creed was taught.

Sir W. ROBSON said the hon. Member was not quite right, because they were dealing with schools which were part of a national system of education, and many of the children were there under compulsion. Therefore they ought not only to consider the four-fifths, but the one fifth.

Mr. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) appealed to the Government to reconsider their attitude to this Amendment and thus avoid doing the injustice to the scheme of the Bill in its original form, and also to the managers of voluntary schools. This scheme of the ballot was introduced at the last moment and it seemed to him that it was indifferently understood by hon. Members and by the Government. His view was that a ballot based on a special register such as that provided by the Government's Amendments on the Paper was absolutely inapplicable in a case of this kind. Unless they could obtain the votes, not of 80 per cent of the parents who were interested, many of whom might have removed from the district during the six months before the ballot was taken, but of 80 per cent of the people on this special register, the clause would become inoperative. Great injustice would be done to the denominational schools if the Amendment was not adopted.

*__Mr. NIELD__ (Middlesex, Ealing) said they were still left in a state of considerable doubt and obscurity as to the meaning of the word "parents," in relation to this ballot which was suggested and by this clause intended to be set up. We had had a variety of electoral systems, but we had never had such a machinery as was now suggested by the Government for ascertaining the views of the majority of the parents of the children. It seemed to him that the Government had set up an artificially constructed ballot in order to make the position of the parents who desired the continuance of denominational teaching as difficult as possible. He ventured to say that a system in which the number of persons who had not recorded their votes was to be taken into account had never been known in the electoral system of this country.

Tellers for the Noes—Mr Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

Lord R. CECIL said he desired to move the Amendment standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin—to leave out the words "public schools" from the first line of paragraph (b). The object was that it should not be necessary to find for the children of the minority another school altogether, provided that sufficient accommodation was afforded either in the four-fifths school itself or somewhere else, for giving them the religious instruction they required. The object of paragraph (b) was quite plain. The theory of the paragraph was that in single school areas it was not fair that the school should be a four-fifths school, or, in other words that there must be provision for the teaching of a Nonconformist child other than in a Church school. Something would have to be done to alter the clause as it stood. What did it amount to? That where three-fourths of the children were members of the Church of England and one-quarter members of the Nonconformist body then they could take from the three-fourths the religious instruction they desired and force upon them the religious instruction which only one-fourth of the children attending the school desired. That did not appear to him to be justice. It was the duty of the Government as far as possible to provide that no child attending a public elementary school should suffer in any way by this Bill in the matter of religious instruction, and to see that every child should receive the religious instruction that its parents desired. If the Amendment were carried no doubt that idea would be nearly secured. The only solution which hon. Members would be compelled to adopt sooner or later, unless they accepted what was proposed in this Amendment, would be one involving purely secular teaching. In that way they would as nearly as possible secure all children against the injustice of receiving religious instruction which they did not require. It was of the utmost importance to provide in every way for meeting the religious objections of the parents. Although the clause was by no means a perfect one, it contained the germ of a settlement, and it was a matter of satisfaction to him that its principle had been upheld by the Party opposite, believing, as he did, that sooner or later they would be compelled to make that principle a reality in the education of the country.

"In page 3, line 9, to leave out the words 'public school.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

Mr. DILLON said the Amendment raised an exceedingly important question—the question why it should be made a condition of giving these extended facilities that the children whose parents did not desire the facilities should have to be accommodated in other schools. It was made a complaint by Nonconformists against Clause 4 that these children were to be turned out of the schools. He did not see why this requirement should apply in the case of schools into which the minority had entered willingly. The parents, unasked, had sent their children to those schools with the present religious instruction in full swing, and therefore, it was perfectly clear that there was no conscientious difficulty. By the very structure of the clause it only applied to schools into which these children went, not from compulsion but from choice. He would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to apply the principle of fair play and equal treatment in this matter. Let them take the ordinary provided schools. There they had a system which had been described by Dr. Clifford as civic Protestantism. Did they insist before they allowed this civic Protestantism to be taught in this country that there should be other school accommodation? If they did not, where was the equality and fair play? Where was the justice of compelling the minority in a provided school, where civic Protestantism was taught to remain there, through want of other accommodation, and of saying that denominational schools should not have the right to teach the religion of the Church of England or Catholic religion to four-fifths, until the other children found accommodation in other schools? That was not justice. In the vast majority of schools that came under Clause 4, where children of another religion went into the schools of their own free will, accepting the religious instruction given, there was no justice or reason in insisting as a condition of the continuation of the instruction that accommodation should be found in other schools for those children.

MR. ALFRED HUTTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Morley) understood there might be some difficulty in dealing with the one-fifth children whose parents did not fall in with the religious education given in the denominational school. The alternative school was supposed to be an adequate provision for them, but he thought hon. Members were now pretty well aware that the law was not the only compulsory force which drove the children into a particular school. Distance, convenience, and safety were strong forces which sometimes compelled their entrance into schools their parents might not otherwise choose. If it was intended by this Amendment that Church of England teaching or Cowper-Temple teaching might be given inside a Roman Catholic school, in some other class-room, at the same time as the extended facilities teaching was given by the authorised person, he saw no reason for opposing the suggestion. He preferred undenominational education, but he was bound to say that as Clause 4 gave very large facilities for those who preferred denominational education he could not see why the Government should not accept the offer now made by the hon. Member for East Mayo. If the matter were pressed to a division he would go into the lobby with the hon. Member.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he gathered from the nature of the cheers on the other side of the House that they anticipated the welcome which he desired to give to the speech that had just been delivered. He only desired to point out to the hon. Member for the Morley Division that the suggestion had been made by other speakers besides the Member for East Mayo, and by no one more earnestly than by himself. The proposal was for universal facilities, and he joined in pressing on the Government the solution which he had already suggested. Whether or not there should be entire separation between religious and secular instruction, so far as payment either out of taxes or rates was concerned, there should be universal facilities for those who dissented from the teaching in any given school to secure for their children the kind of religious education which they desired. Where children, owing to reasons of distance, convenience, and the like, were sent for secular education to a school at which religious instruction was given of which their parents did not approve, it would be very unsafe to rely upon those parents to support the managers in securing the continuance of the religious instruction now given.

MR. BIRRELL said the construction which the right hon. Gentleman put upon the Amendment was that it would make facilities universal. That was a course which the Government could not adopt. They had made the course they had taken perfectly plain. It was part and parcel of the proposals of Clause 4 that the facilities should not be extended unless there was in the area where the four-fifths school was set up, undenominational accommodation in a public school for the children who did not desire the facilities. This was a very difficult Amendment to deal with. It started off by leaving out the words "public school." Those words had a technical meaning. Parliament, by Section 5 of the Act of 1870, had required the provision of a sufficient amount of public school accommodation without payment of a fee. It was essential that there should be in an area where a four-fifths school was set up sufficient public school accommodation—accommodation in a school where no fee was charged—for the children whose parents did not desire these facilities. That was one technical reason why it was impossible to accept the Amendment. The Bill proceeded on the assumption that the children were not required to go to the four-fifths school, and, if their parents refused, that there should be public school accommodation elsewhere. It was not proposed, as the hon. Member for East Mayo suggested, that the one-fifth should be turned out, but only that there should be another school to which they could go if they wanted to.

MR. DILLON: Supposing they all declared they did not want to go, must they still have the other accommodation provided for them?

MR. BIRRELL said no, and that was not the point. The objection to the noble Lord's proposal was that the one-fifth might be kept in the school against their will. If they were satisfied with the school they could vote for it, and that school would then get the facilities. But it was perfectly plain that if they were dissatisfied, and did not want their children educated in the school with these extended facilities, it was part and parcel, a sine qua non of the proposal of the Government that there should be a public school within the area in which they could receive their secular instruction. The Government view was that in the four-fifths school there might be denominational teaching every day in the week, and they did not wish to introduce into these four-fifths schools what was called the "Cowper-Temple religion." Neither did they wish to compel any child to receive this denominational teaching if its parents objected to it. Therefore, anyone who had made a study of Clause 4 would see that it was impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of those who had made a special study of Clause 4. A great many of them had made a special study of the clause, but they had seldom had a more difficult subject for investigation, and since the Government had set to work to amend it, the clause had become perfectly unintelligible. The right hon. Gentleman, with a confidence which really surprised him, had spoken as if the Committee were seised of the method by which the Education Department and the local authority were to make themselves acquainted with the wishes of the one-fifth minority. They had not the least notion how the opinion of the one-fifth was to be ascertained. Would the Government destroy the denominational character of a school where there was one-fifth of a different denomination, but who did not want to go anywhere else? The Bill required other accommodation to be found for the minority. Why go to that expense if the existing accommodation were satisfactory? Why, if there were no other accommodation, destroy the denominational character of the school? The right hon. Gentleman was ingenious in his defence of Clause 4. Whenever it was criticised, he said with engaging frankness that it was a wretched, indefensible, and inconsistent clause, but that its critics ought to be thankful for having any clause at all. By rejecting an Amendment evidently calculated to carry out the wishes of the parents, the right hon. Gentleman had excited the disgust of the hon. Member for Morley, who spoke for the Nonconformists. [Cries of "No."] The hon. Member used to speak for the Nonconformists, and his fate was a sad example of the mutability of human fortunes. The hon. Member had lapsed into a generous and tolerant attitude towards those who did not agree with him in their religious and educational views. What was the result? Faithful service extending over many years, laborious efforts made all through the protracted debates of 1902 against the iniquitous provisions of a flagitious measure—all these were vain, one lapse into generosity had wiped out the services of years. The hon. Member would be driven in the long run to take his place among the small but faithful band of Liberal Churchmen, or even to cross the floor of the House and utter his criticisms of the Government in a less chilling atmosphere and amid less hostile surroundings. But though the right hon. Gentleman was obdurate to persuasion, the case submitted was difficult to resist. There was the case of the school mentioned by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham—a school built, recently, entirely out of Church funds, in the neighbourhood of board schools and yet containing a considerable number of Nonconformist children. The Government asserted that the parents of these children would, if they preferred a denominational to a Board School for their children, vote for the continuance of the denominational system. Surely, that was the last course which knowledge of human nature suggested as probable. By the provisions of the Bill the Government, while surely doing all they could for the one-third of Nonconformist children who voluntarily went to that school, might have some consideration for the two-thirds whose money had been spent in providing the school, seeing that it remained in the possession of the denomination as a denominational school, with the power of having special facilities for the two-thirds of the school children adhering to the denomination. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Amendment was contrary to the plan of the Government. This procedure had been adopted by the Government throughout these debates. He believed that the clause was genuinely intended as some relief to the denominationalists, and as such he had intended to welcome it. But when he found that everything which prevented the clause from being a delusion was rejected, that everything which turned a sham into a reality was cast aside with scorn, he did not know whether he would not express his own feelings worse by supporting the clause than by voting against it. The right hon. Gentleman had shown no attempt to meet the Opposition, neither had he attempted to make the clause a reality. ["Oh, oh."] The right hon. Gentleman's excuse was that this was an undenominational Bill, and a denominational clause stuck into it was an anomaly, and, being an anomaly, they could not expect the work to be artistically perfect. Was, then, the clause worthy the support of the Committee in its present shape? ["No."] In view of the line which the right hon. Gentleman had taken, it was a very difficult question to answer; but it was clear that no denomination would really gain by the clause unless it was profoundly amended at some later stage of the Bill. Unfortunately, the Opposition were not in a position to compel the production of these Amendments on the Committee stage, as might have been the case had there been greater opportunities of discussion. There were cases in which no Government could stand the reiterated expression of unanswerable arguments. The arguments were unanswerable, but they could not be reiterated, and in Committee the Clause would pass with all its imperfections upon it. But if it remained permanently in the shape in which the Government desired to pass it at present, the idea that it was a valuable concession to certain great interests in the country was a complete delusion. Changes would have to be introduced in it at future stages, and they must be real and substantial if they were to carry out the policy which the Government themselves professed.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES:—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

Amendment made—

"In page 3, line 25, by inserting, after the word 'inquiry,' the words 'and causing a ballot to be taken.'"—(Mr. Birrell.)

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 2, at the end, to add the words 'where the local education authority refuse to agree to an arrangement offered to them by the owners of the schoolhouse of an existing voluntary school as respects the use of the schoolhouse, and the school is one in respect of which extended facilities could be granted under this section, and are desired, the owners of the schoolhouse may appeal to the Board of Education, and that Board may, if they think fit, after considering the circumstances of the case, and the wishes of the parents of children attending the school as to the continuance of the school with extended facilities, by order, make an arrangement under this Act with respect to the use of the schoolhouse on such terms and conditions as may be contained in the order, including, if thought fit, a condition requiring extended facilities to be afforded, but if under any special circumstances of the case the Board think it expedient, they may, instead of making such an arrangement, make an order allowing the school to continue as a State-aided school. Provided that—

"'(a) An order shall not be made under this provision unless the schoolhouse is, in the opinion of the Board of Education, structurally suitable; and (b) An arrangement made by order for the use of a schoolhouse under this provision shall not have effect for more than five years.

"'It shall be the duty of the local education authority to comply with any condition contained in any arrangement made by an order under this section.'"—(Mr. Birrell.)

Question proposed, "That the Amendment be made."

MR. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness), on a point of order, said that at the commencement of the debate on Clause 4 the Chairman ruled an Amendment, which stood in the name of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester, out of order because the Committee had already settled by Clause 1 that every public elementary school should become a provided school. He therefore submitted that according to that ruling this Amendment also was out of order.

*The CHAIRMAN said the ruling which he gave on the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester was because the words he proposed would have left a very large class of schools in a condition which would have been a contravention of a decision to which the Committee had already come. In this case the matter was different. The ruling on which questions of this kind should be treated was that Amendments should not be allowed to introduce a system inconsistent with the principle already laid down. He must say in regard to this particular Amendment that he could not in any case rule it out of order, because he was not at all sure that the State-aided schools would be recognised as public elementary schools. That alone would prevent him from ruling it out of order; but even if that consideration were out of the way any conclusion to which they had come would not prevent an Amendment permitting standing out in exceptional cases. The effect of the Government Amendment was merely to add one other small exception of a very limited character to those already contained in Clause 38.

THE FLAG AT WESTMINSTER.

THE EARL OF MEATH rose to ask His Majesty's Government whether the National Flag on the Palace of Westminster was lowered to half-mast on the announcement of the death of the late Right Hon. Richard Seddon, P.C., Premier of New Zealand, or at the time of his funeral, or of the memorial service lately held in St. Paul's Cathedral, and if not, whether His Majesty's Government do not consider that the time has arrived in the history of the Empire when such a national tribute of respect and of sympathy should, on the death of a Premier of a British self - governing colony, be paid to his memory by the Parliament of the Mother Country.

The noble Earl said: My Lords, since I put my Question on the notice Paper of your Lordships' House I have been advised that the raising and lowering of the National Flag on the Houses of Parliament is within the prerogative of His Majesty the King, inasmuch as this building is a Royal palace. This information has come to me from a private source. In consequence of this fact I have given notice that I propose to add to the Question as it has already been printed the words—

> "And will advise His Majesty the King, in the exercise of his prerogative, to give the necessary instructions in regard thereto."

By the death of the Right Hon. Richard Seddon, P.C., Premier of New Zealand, the British Empire has sustained a very serious, and in some particulars an irreparable, loss. This successful statesman and devoted son of the Empire was a very remarkable man. The son of a Lancashire schoolmaster and schoolmistress, he laid no claim to classical culture; in fact, it is known that as a boy he resisted the efforts of his father to teach him Latin. But, on the other hand, his sound common-sense, his great knowledge of the work - a - day world and of all things connected with it, his strength of character and belief in himself, his courage, endurance, independence, and indifference to criticism, his power of impressing his will on others, his energy, and his evident earnestness in all that he took up, made his personality irresistible.

For fourteen years, until his recent death, Mr. Seddon held the reins of power in New Zealand, and during four general elections he was re-elected with large and ever increasing majorities, proving that he had obtained the love and affection of the people of New Zealand. None of his predecessors had ever remained in office longer than four years. Such was his hold on the affections of the people of New Zealand that, if he had not died at the comparatively early age of sixty-one, in all probability he would have remained at the head of affairs in that country so long as his working powers lasted. He told interviewers that he was neither a Radical, a Liberal, a Conservative, nor a Socialist. He said—

> "I desire to improve the condition of the people socially, morally, and politically, to inspire them with hope and to give them every opportunity of securing comfort in old age without sacrificing their independence."

Whatever we may think of the political and social measures for which he was responsible, there can be no doubt whatever that the vast majority of the people of New Zealand warmly supported them; and not only that, his popularity increased year by year so that he reversed the usual experience of Governments, who find that their popularity is in inverse ratio to the length of their tenure of office.

In New Zealand he will probably be remembered as the author of two important measures—the Female Suffrage Act and the Old Age Pension Law. But for us at home he will ever remain the great Imperialist statesman who, when the military resources of this country were at their very lowest ebb, sent to our assistance in South Africa a gallant band of trained marksmen and skilled horsemen who rendered yeoman service in defence of the Empire. Since the war in South Africa the relation towards the mother country of the Colonies has been altered in a great degree. By associating themselves actively with the mother country and with each other in mutual defence they have identified themselves with imperial interests and acquired a distinct right to be consulted in all matters of an imperial character. To my mind, my Lords, the British Empire owes a deep debt of gratitude to the late President Kruger for having been the means of uniting and solidifying the British Empire. New Zealand took a full share in this memorable struggle, sparing neither blood nor treasure.

The spirit which animated those men who fought for us was their own, but it was Richard Seddon who gave them the opportunity of showing what they were made of. He it was who set an example of patriotism to New Zealand by sending his own son to the war before asking others to follow his example. Does not the Empire, and especially the mother country, owe some gratitude to this sturdy imperialist of the Antipodes? Surely we do, and New Zealand may rest assured that his action in the hour of the Empire's need, and the gallant deeds of her sons, will never be forgotten as long as the sun in the course of its revolution sets on the folds of the Union Jack in New Zealand and rises in Great Britain to salute the well-known emblem of British sovereignty.

I do not know what Answer may be given to my Question with regard to the lowering of the National Flag to half-mast on the occasion of Mr. Seddon's decease. I fear it may possibly prove to be in the negative, but, if so, I am confident that such regrettable inaction will not have been due to any want of respect or sympathy but from lack of precedent and initiative in the perception by His Majesty's Government of the entirely altered position occupied by New Zealand and the other self-governing Colonies since the date of the Boer War.

*THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of LIVERPOOL): My Lords, the Answer to the first paragraph of the noble Earl's Question is in the negative. The flag on the Victoria Tower of the Palace of Westminster is only lowered to half-mast on the death of the Sovereign or of a member of the Royal Family, and the First Commissioner of Works does not see any reason for departing from the decision of the late Government in this matter. As to the supplementary Question, His Majesty's Government do not see their way to take the course suggested; but in saying that, I wish to associate myself entirely with the noble Earl's eulogium of the late Mr. Seddon, whom everyone must look upon as a great statesman, and whose loss to the Empire all must deplore. I have always kept in touch with New Zealand politics, through an old and valued friend, who was leader of the Opposition there during Mr. Seddon's earlier terms of office, and who has now passed away, and I know from him that all parties in New Zealand held Mr. Seddon in the highest respect. Perhaps I ought to point out that though the Union Jack is a national flag, it is no more the national flag of this country than the American Jack or the Jack of Russia are national flags. A Royal palace moreover, is not in the same category as other buildings from which flags are flown.

LORD STANMORE: My Lords, may I be allowed to point out to the noble Earl who has brought this matter to the attention of your Lordships this afternoon, that if his suggestion had been adopted by His Majesty's Government there would be the greatest possible difficulty in discriminating between one Colonial Premier and another. You must either show this mark of respect in the case of the death of every Premier of an important Colony, which would reduce it to a mere matter of form, or you must discriminate between their respective merits, which it is not in the province of this House or of His Majesty's Government to do.

ARMY MEAT CONTRACTS.

THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government why the contracts for beef for the Army have been changed so as to substitute home-killed beef for home-bred beef. The Question is a very short one, but it embraces many people and many interests. Some years ago imported dead meat was served out to our troops, but in consequence of the great outcry against it an arrangement was made that the troops should have on five days home-bred beef and on two days Australian or New Zealand mutton. That went on for some time, and gave every satisfaction. The arrangement remains in force, I believe, where the contract is accepted for live cattle, but in all dead meat contracts home-killed is allowed; that is to say, home-bred is entirely done away with. All cattle imported alive have, as we know, to be killed at the port of entry, and therefore all cattle imported into this country, whether from Canada, America, or the Argentine, comes under the category of home-killed.

This is a great blow to the farmer and to all agriculturists in England, Ireland and Scotland, and it is one they hardly merit. On Ireland, a purely agricultural country, the blow falls most heavily. To show your Lordships that this is not a small matter, I may mention that the annual consumption of meat by the Army and Navy represents 164,250 head of cattle, the money value being about £2,792,000. By one stroke of the pen, by the alteration of one word in a contract, this trade is almost swept away. The cattle and dead meat imported into this country govern the price of cattle in the United Kingdom. If there is an enormous import of dead meat and live cattle the price of stores naturally falls at once, and this is felt throughout England, Ireland and Scotland. I cannot see, therefore, what the advantage is in altering the contract in this way, because if the price of cattle is governed by the importation, surely it is just the same if you allow home-bred cattle to be killed for the purpose of the troops Surely among the millions that inhabit these Islands there are more than enough to consume the imported beef. I am sure the troops would be more than pleased if our farmers were allowed to supply them with the roast beef of Old England and of Ireland and Scotland.

I should like to read to your Lordships the curt and decisive letter which was received from the Army Council by the Secretary of the Irish Cattle Traders and Stockowners' Association. Here it is—

Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 12th inst., transmitting a copy of a resolution passed by your committee on the subject of War Department contracts for meat, I am commanded by the Army Council to inform you that troops in the United Kingdom get fresh beef five days a week, and the main reason for the alteration in the tender form was to widen the source of supply, and to obtain the best quality at the most reasonable price.

The words in the tender form are general, and include beef from imported cattle killed at port of entry. There is no intention of again substituting "home-bred" for "home-killed" in the tender forms.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

(Signed), R. M. BRUDE.

The Secretary Irish Cattle Traders and Stockowners' Association.

I suppose that may be considered as the law of the Medes and Persians, and that in future English, Irish and Scottish farmers are to be precluded from providing the troops with home-bred beef. Farmers all pay taxes, and I think some consideration might be shown to them.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of PORTSMOUTH): My Lords, this question has been raised on several occasions recently in another place, and I would refer the noble Earl to the replies given on those occasions by the Secretary of State. The only object in altering the Army contract forms so as to substitute home-killed for home-bred beef was to widen the source of supply of meat for the Army with a view to obtaining the best meat at the lowest price. As the Secretary of State has said, the policy of the Government in this matter is one of free trade—i.e., to buy meat where we can get it best and cheapest; and I am afraid that I can hold out no hope of a return to the old arrangements. These arrangements, of course, did give a decided preference to the home agriculturist, but it must be remembered that this preference was given at the expense of the public Exchequer. We expect by the new arrangements to effect a considerable saving in the annual Estimates under the Supply Vote. The present demand in this country for foreign home-killed beef points to its satisfactory quality. By opening the Army contracts to it we are both saving public money and keeping down pro tanto the price of meat for the consuming public.

THE EARL OF MAYO: When the time comes I hope the noble Earl will be able to point out to me the saving to the consuming public as a result of this arrangement.

WORCESTER ELECTION.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord LOREBURN): My Lords, your Lordships will have observed that a message has come from the Commons that they have agreed to an Address to be presented to His Majesty, in which they desire the concurrence of this House, viz.:—

"Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Majesty that Sir John Compton Lawrence, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, and Sir Joseph Walton, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, being two of the Judges appointed for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to The Parliamentary Elections Acts, 1868, and The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879, have reported to the House of Commons that there was reason to believe extensive corrupt practices had taken place at the last Election for the City of Worcester.

"We therefore humbly pray Your Majesty that Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause inquiry to be made, pursuant to the powers of the Act of Parliament passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled 'An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament,' by the appointing of Edward Tindal Atkinson, esquire, one of Your Majesty's Counsel, Attorney-General for Your Majesty's Palatine of Durham, and Recorder of Leeds; Horace Edmund Avory, esquire, also one of Your Majesty's Counsel and Recorder of Kingston-upon-Thames; and Charles Willie Matthews, esquire, Barrister-at-law and Recorder of Salisbury, as Commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Technical Education in India.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state what is the total amount spent out of State funds on technical education in India.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The total amount spent out of public funds in India on technical education during 1904-5 was Rs. 6,78,000 (£45,200).

Date of Indian Budget Debate.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether a decision has been arrived at as to the date for the discussion of the Indian Budget.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) We hope to take the Indian Budget on July 20th.

Irish Postal Service Promotions.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General on what principle of merit or seniority is promotion regulated in the postal service in Ireland; whether he can say why a Mr. Gibson was promoted to the surveyors' office in Dublin over the heads of other members of the Portadown staff of longer service and higher qualifications, and why were not applications for the position invited from other members of the staff; and whether he can also say why a substitute, named Magennis, was transferred from Portadown to Letterkenny, whilst a substitute of inferior qualification who was drawing sustenance money has been retained.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The case of Mr. Gibson, to which the hon. Member refers, is not one of promotion but of temporary employment in the Surveying Department. For such employment it is not the practice to invite applications, as it is necessary to select officers who are known to possess special qualifications for that class of work. Mr. Gibson was considered to possess the best qualifications for this work. The substitute, named Magennis, has been selected for temporary duty in the Letterkenny post office because, in the event of the post which he is filling temporarily becoming vacant, he has the first claim to consideration for the appointment.

Telegraphic Facilities at Southampton.

Lieutenant - Colonel PHILIPPS (Southampton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience and delay to firms at the Southampton Docks owing to the present position of the telegraph office there; and whether he will consider if arrangements cannot be made for an additional telegraph office near the main dock gates, where it can be more easily, quickly, and safely reached by those sending telegrams, such an office to be connected, if possible, by a pneumatic tube with the present main office at the platform.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Representations on the subject have reached me. I understand that a telegraph office is desired at the post office in Canute Road, but as that office is not a quarter of a mile from the head telegraph office another telegraph office seems scarcely justified. I understand, moreover, that a new entrance to the docks is being provided close to the head telegraph office, so that the latter should meet all requirements.

Female Medical Officers for Glasgow Postal Staff.

Mr. WATT (Glasgow College): To ask the Postmaster-General if he has taken into consideration the advisability of appointing one or more female doctors to the position of medical officers to the post office at Glasgow; and if he will now say into how many districts he proposes to divide the appointment.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I do not think it would be advisable to appoint female medical officers to any of the six districts into which Glasgow will be divided.

Claims of Irish Evicted Tenants.

Mr. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that particulars of the claims of the following evicted tenants in Thomastown Union, namely, Michael Walsh, Oldtown, Thomastown, on Colonel Hanford's Flood Hall estate; James Walsh, Plebourstown, Thomastown, and Michael Farrell, Plebourstown, on Colonel Butler's Kearney's estate; and Thomas Kelly, Thomastown, on Rev. R. P. Clifford's estate, were lodged with the Estates Commissioners a long time ago; and will he say whether these claims have been examined and with what result; and what, if any, action has been taken in regard to them by the Estates Commissioners; and if no action has yet been taken, whether he will state when an inspector will be sent down, and when a settlement may be expected.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received applications for reinstatement from the persons indicated, and will have these applications inquired into by their inspector, who has been directed to investigate the claims of evicted tenants in county Kilkenny.

Irish School Managers and Dr. Starkie.

MR. P. A. McHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at a meeting of the Catholic Clerical School Managers' Association for Ireland, held in the Gresham Hotel, Dublin, on the 5th June, 1906, a resolution was unanimously adopted expressing dissatisfaction at the continuance in office of the present Resident Commissioner of National Education, Dr. Starkie; and whether he has investigated the reasons assigned for their dissatisfaction, and what steps does he propose to take to secure the re-establishment of cordial relations between the managers and those charged with the control of primary education in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I was not aware that the resolution referred to had been passed. The entire subject of primary education in Ireland deserves to to be carefully considered; but I may say that the Irish Government entertain the very highest opinion of Dr. Starkie's zeal and ability.

Summonses for Disturbance at Eviction of Mr. Ward at Loughrea.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that some thirty or forty persons were served with summonses by the police for participation in the disturbances in connection with the eviction of Mr. Ward, at Loughrea; that a meeting of those summonsed was held, at which it was decided that, if fines were imposed by a packed jury, they would go to gaol in a body rather than pay the fines; whether in view of this threat the summonses were withdrawn; and will he say by whose authority the summonses were issued in the first instance, and by whose authority they were withdrawn.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) No persons were summoned for participation in any disturbance in connection with the eviction of Mr. Ward, at Loughrea, but summonses were issued against some persons for being drunk and disorderly. I am not aware that any such meeting as is mentioned in the Question was held. The summonses were not withdrawn in view of the alleged threat, or of any threat. They were issued in the ordinary way, under the authority of the Inspector-General, and were withdrawn by his order and with the approval of the Irish Government.

Waterford Toll Bridge.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, on the completion of the new central railway station by the Fishguard and Rossclare Company and the Great Southern and Western Company, north of the River Suir, at Waterford, the former company will be empowered to cease to use the station at the south side of the river for passenger and other traffic, and thereby to compel passengers and goods, which have hitherto entered Waterford by the south station, to pay tolls on the toll bridge for crossing to and from the city to the station on the north side; and whether a rebate of such tolls can be claimed by such passengers and traffic from the Fishguard Company.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. I have communicated with both the railway companies concerned in the matter, and I am informed that it is not proposed to take any steps to close the existing station on the south side of the River Suir pending the decision of the question of the provision of a free bridge in lieu of the existing toll bridge. As the hon. Member is no doubt aware, the Fishguard and Rosslare Company are under a statutory obligation to contribute towards the cost of the suggested new bridge.

Sale of Sir H. Burke's Estate at the Marble Hill.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Estates Commissioners has been directed to the negotiations going on for the sale of the widely-spread estate of Sir Henry Burke, Marble Hill, Woodford, to the tenants; are the Commissioners aware that the townlands comprising the really rich sections of the estate are being sold first, for the purpose of raising the market value of the poor mountainous parts of the property; and, in view of the possibility of the poor people living in these arid mountain districts being forced or induced to sign agreements neither fair to themselves or the ratepayers, will he call the attention of the Estates Commissioners to the proposed sale of this estate, with a view, amongst other matters, of having Mr L. F. Egan and other evicted tenants reinstated in their evicted homes.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have no reason to believe that sales of portions of this estate are being arranged with the object mentioned in the Question. The Commission have referred the applications of the evicted tenants to one of their inspectors for inquiry in connection with the sale of the property.

Royal Irish Constabulary Inspectors—Mr. H. Moriarty.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state on whose recommendation Mr. H. Moriarty has been appointed sub-inspector of police in Ballymahon; where this officer served before; how many police stations he had then under his charge; whether he is aware that whilst in other police districts officers have to inspect twenty stations this officer will only have to inspect five; and on what ground he has been transferred from a harder to an easier district.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that in county Longford there is a county inspector and three district inspectors of constabulary to inspect sixteen police stations, while in many places in Ireland one district inspector has charge of a much larger number of stations than these four officers together; and whether, seeing that the Government policy of reducing the number of these officials is in many cases blocked by the efforts of the constabulary authorities to favour the influential owners of the houses of which these inspectors are tenants, he proposes to take any and, if any, what action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Inspector-General informs me that he, of his own motion, transfered this officer from Belmullet to Ballymahon. At Belmullet the district inspector had charge of eight stations, and at Ballymahon he has charge of six. There is no district in Ireland in which a district inspector would have to inspect as many as twenty stations. Mr. Moriarty was transferred from county Mayo because he was marrying a lady connected with that county, and under the regulations he could no longer serve there. There is, in Longford, as in every other county of Ireland, a county inspector of constabulary; and there are in the county three police districts, each in charge of a district inspector. In two of these districts there are six, and in the third five, police stations. This is about the usual number as compared with other counties. The Inspector-General informs me that he is not aware of any case to which the circumstances mentioned in the concluding part of the second Question applies.

Irish National Schools—Rebuilding Plans

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that injury is caused to education in Ireland by the delay in issuing the new arrangements for the building of national schools in Ireland; and whether steps will be taken to have these new regulations issued as soon as possible.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am well aware that there is great need for the erection of new national school buildings and the improvement of existing school buildings in Ireland; and the Irish Government is doing its best to accelerate the settlement of a scheme for that purpose.

Report of Consultative Committee of Education.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now in a position to lay upon the Table the Report of the Consultative Committee of Education.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I fear that I cannot add anything to the reply which I gave to the right hon. Gentleman's similar Question on the 20th instant.†

Teaching of Irish in Schools.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he would lay upon the Table copies of the resolution and correspondence which have passed between the Government and the Board of Intermediate Education with reference to the teaching of Irish in the schools.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The right hon. Gentleman's long official experience will have made him aware that it would not be in accordance with practice to lay upon the Table copies of the correspondence which has passed between the Government and any Department or Board, and quite irregular to do so while the correspondence is still incomplete.

Improvements of Kinara Harbour.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how much money was allowed and placed at the disposal of the Board Works to carry out the improvements to Kinvara Harbour; when the works were brought to an abrupt conclusion, on the 30th April, 1906, how much of the the money remained unexpended; and will the balance, if any, be handed over to the county council for the extension of the pier.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The certified works at Kinvara, under the Marine Works Act, were estimated to cost £1,900, of which the sum of £1,100 was allocated from the Marine Works Fund and £800 was to be contributed by the county council. These works have been completed; and as they were executed by the Board of Works themselves, instead of by a contractor, and as it was found that portions of the old work were still quite sound, the Board were enabled to complete the work at a cost of £1,369. The county council have not yet paid their contribution. The balance cannot be handed over to the council for the proposed extension to the pier. It is in regard to that proposed extension that the legal difficulty mentioned in my reply to the hon. Member's Question of Tuesday last has arisen.†

Sale of the St. George's Estate, Tyrone—Case of Mary Greally.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received agreement forms from the tenants on the St. George's Estate, Tyrone, Clarenbridge, Galway; and, before sanctioning the same, will inquiries be made into the case of widow Mary Greally, of Kilcolgan, who was evicted out of her holding some years ago, with a view of having her reinstated.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that no agreements for purchase have yet been lodged with them in this case. They will, however, have inquiries made into the case of Mrs. Greally.

Spread of Consumption in Ireland.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the death rate from consumption has risen from 19 to 25 per 10,000 of the population in Ireland within the course of the past few years, while in England it has fallen from 24 to 12 per 10,000 of the population; and whether in view of the fact that 14,000 of our people are doomed to die of this disease in 1907, he will advise the Government to take such steps as may be deemed necessary to stop the ravages of this insidious but preventable disease.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I beg to refer to my reply to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for West Cavan on Tuesday last,‡ which has probably escaped the hon. Member's notice. The Question is engaging the close attention of the Irish Government, who will do all they can to check the evil.

Congestion in County Galway.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he received a copy of a resolution, passed by the Galway County Council at their meeting on the 18th instant, calling the attention of the Government to the fact that very little has been done, in the county of Galway and other areas affected, to relieve the state of congestion which exists, and impressing on them the necessity of forming a Royal Commission at once to inquire into the matter; and what steps the Government propose to take in the matter.

‡ See Col. 794.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I have received the resolution referred to. The subject is, I understand, to be discussed this afternoon, and anything I have to say can be better said then.

Application for Untenanted Land at Ardrahan, County Galway.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received a memorial from a body of very small tenants in the parish of Ardrahan, county Galway, as well as from a body of suitable applicants who are anxious to secure holdings, requesting them to consider their claims to the untenanted lands recently purchased by the Estates Commissioners from Mr. Burton Persse in the parish of Ardrahan; and whether any decision has been arrived at in reference to the allocation of these lands.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are unable to identify, from the information furnished in the Question, the particular memorial referred to. Proceedings for the sale of a portion of the Burton Persse Estate have been instituted before the Commissioners, and all applications for land received from the tenants and others have been referred to their inspector for inquiry in connection with his inspection. These applications will be considered by the Commissioners in due course.

Monthly Payment of Salaries of Irish School Teachers.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have refused to pay the salaries of teachers monthly instead of quarterly, as they do at present, solely because it would cost too much to do so; if he is aware that the Commissioners pay the salaries of the resident Commissioner, the inspectors, and the staff of the office monthly; if so, will he explain why the same plan cannot be adopted in the case of the teachers; will he say if any members of the Commisioners' staff is more than sixty-five years of age, and, if so, why is he retained; if he will recommend the Commissioners to ask any of the other public boards who pay monthly salaries to assist and advise how to do so without incurring much additional expense; and if there is any other instance in the public service where persons in receipt of one pound a week are paid only four times yearly.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the fact is as stated in the first paragraph. The salaries of the central and inspection staffs are paid monthly. These combined staffs number less than 200 individuals, and the payment of their salaries is not contingent on average attendance and other conditions which have to be considered in connection with payments of teachers' salaries. The number of national teachers, pupil teachers, and monitors is about 17,000, and the same plan of payment could not be adopted in their case. No member of the permanent staff is over sixty-five years of age. The question of paying the teachers' salaries is one entirely for the Commissioners themselves, and they hold that it would be quite impossible to make monthly payments without a very large increase of staff.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of James Smythe.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland to state whether the Estates Commissioners have received any application from James Smythe, of Larkfield, county Longford, for restoration to his mother's evicted farm on the Dopping Estate; and whether, in view of the fact that this estate is now being sold to the tenants, care will be taken that no new tenancy of this holding will be sanctioned by the Commissioners as forming part of the estates for sale, unless the same is made to James Smythe, the lawful heir of the former tenant.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received an application for reinstatement from James Smythe, and will have the same duly inquired into before they sanction the sale of the estate referred to. Proceedings for the sale of this estate have not yet, however, been commenced before the Commissioners.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of Peter Victory.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any application has been received by the Estates Commissioners from Peter Victory for restoration to him of the farm on the Dopping Estate to which he is entitled; and whether, as arrangements are now about being made for the sale of this estate to the tenants, care will be taken by the Estates Commissioners that the evicted tenants on the property, including Peter Victory, are readmitted to their holdings.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners have received Peter Victory's application for reinstatement, not on the Dopping Estate, but on the estate of Captain White. The applicant states that his former holding is occupied by Patrick McGirney, and the Commissioners' records show that McGirney has already purchased under the Land Act what is presumably the holding in question. Victory's application will, however, be inquired into by the local inspectors in due course.

Fair Rent Appeals at Killarney.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware that in the preliminary list for the sitting of the Chief Land Commissioners at Killarney, on the 3rd July next there were sixteen cases listed on the estate of the Earl of Kenmare, whereas, on the final list, now published, only two of these cases appear; and whether he can state the cause of the omission of the other cases, some of which have been before the Commissioners since 1898.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Land Commission that the preliminary list of fair rent appeals to be heard at Killarney on 3rd July was sent to each appellant with a notice stating that the final list would comprise as many of the cases as the Judicial Commissioners considered it possible to hear in the time at their disposal, and requesting that appellants would notify the Commissioners of any appeals which they did not intend to prosecute, or in which settlements had been arrived at or sales were pending, or which for any other reason would not go to a hearing. This notice explains the exclusion of any cases which do not appear in the final list.

Supply of Answers to Irish Questions.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will consider the advisability of supplying Members with copies of the Questions that are answered orally, as is the custom in other Government Departments.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The hon. Member does not seem to be aware that it is my practice to send to the lobby at the back of Mr. Speaker's Chair copies of my oral Answers for the use of hon. Members, and marked "For Irish Members." I am not aware what the practice of other Ministers may be, but I do not think there is any invariable custom in the matter.

Irish Land Purchase—Improper Sales.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that some landlords are, for the purpose of obtaining public money under the Land Act of 1903, by means of agreements called judicial, but never approved by any court, eluding inspection and selling within the zones of that Act holdings to which the Land Acts, used legitimately, do not apply; and, seeing that embarrassed tenants will not voluntarily expose this practice, will the Estates Commissioners ascertain the date of such an agreement in every case, disallow all signed since 1902, and have the holdings inspected as non-judicial.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that, in any case in which it appears that a judicial rent for a first statutory term has been fixed by agreement made since 1st January, 1903, it is their practice, before sanctioning an advance, to make full inquiries into all the circumstances of the case with the object of ascertaining whether an inspection is necessary or not.

Northumberland Artillery Militia Training Ground.

SIR ROBERT HOBART: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, as the Northumberland Artillery Militia are mainly recruited at Newcastle-on-Tyne, the headquarters could be moved to Newcastle-on-Tyne Royal Artillery Barracks from Berwick-on-Tweed, by which means the expense of conveying men backwards and forwards, both on joining and dismissal, between Newcastle and Berwick, en route for Portsmouth, where the regiment is trained, would be saved.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) To move the headquarters of the regiment to Newcastle would necessitate the building of quarters and accessories similar to those available at Berwick, and the acquisition of a site for this purpose. No funds are, however, available.

Barrack Accommodation at the British Legation at Pekin.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the inadequacy of the accommodation provided for the officers and men of the British Legation guard at Pekin; whether, in view of the fact that the Legation's civil quarters are excellent, and the German and Dutch military are properly accommodated, he will take steps to provide suitable quarters for the British guard; and whether he is aware that there is no hospital for the British military garrison.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The provision of suitable accommodation for the British Legation guard at Pekin and of a hospital is at the present moment being carefully considered, and it is hoped that a decision will be reached at an early date.

Additional Squadron of Lovat Scouts.

MR. JOHN DEWAR (Inverness): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he has received a petition from over 300 men in South Uist, asking that an additional squadron may be added to the Lovat Scouts, as a large number of men in that district are anxious to join the regiment; and whether having regard to the high character of this regiment and the excellent material to be obtained in recruits from that district, he is able to grant the request.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The petition has been received, and has been referred to the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, Scottish Command, for report.

Disposal of Sites and Buildings connected with the Defence of London.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for War when he will be in a position to state his proposals with regard to disposing of the sites and buildings connected with the defences of London.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) These buildings are at present full of ammunition and tools, for which no accommodation is immediately available elsewhere. Consequently, I cannot at present say when I can make the statement required by the hon. Member.

Suggested Government Grant to Rifle Clubs.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he proposes to stimulate the growth of rifle clubs throughout the country by making them a grant from the funds at his disposal.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) I have at present no funds at my disposal to further the growth of rifle clubs. It would be premature to discuss, at this moment, the possible provision of such funds in the future.

British Commercial Representation Abroad.

MR. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.) To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will inform the House as to the number of commercial agents, other than consular agents, in the service of the respective Governments of France, Belgium, Germany, the United States of America, and Japan, who are resident in this country; and as to the number of commercial agents, other than consular agents, in the service of the British Government, who are resident in France, Belgium, Germany, the United States of America, Japan, and China.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) There is a commercial attaché on the staff of the French Embassy, and a technical attaché on that of the German Embassy. No appointments of commercial agents have been notified to the Foreign Office by either the United States, Belgium, or Japan. There are British commercial attachés for France and Belgium, Germany, China and Japan; and there is also a British commercial agent in the United States.

The Egyptian Shooting Affair.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the recent affray between British officers and Egyptians at Tantah, whether he has yet received any detailed information as to the circumstances which led to the affray; whether any of the natives were killed or injured, will the British officers who took part in the affray be tried; whether the pigeons shot on these occasions are tame or wild pigeons; whether pigeon shooting in the neighbourhood of villages is a legal occupation in Egypt; whether in this instance the permission of the head man of the village had been obtained by the officers before they commenced to shoot; what were the special grounds on which the Agent and Consul of Great Britain demanded that the accused Egyptians in this case should be sent for trial before the Special Tribunal; and whether there is any appeal from the Special Tribunal before which the Egyptians are to be tried.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) When a report appeared in the Press yesterday, I telegraphed to know what the sentences were and what were the facts established at the trial, saying that it was desirable we should know them before any death sentences were executed. The information I have received is as follows, the sentences were as stated in the Press. With regard to the trial, the prisoners were defended by three of the best known native advocates, who had a full hearing. The Court was unanimous as regards the prisoners found guilty, and the evidence clearly established premeditation and concerted action. Thirty-one of the prisoners were acquitted, and twenty-one were found guilty. The Court expressed its opinion that the British officers had behaved with extreme forbearance and self-restraint. The chief attack took place after they had given up their guns, and was persisted in with great brutality. I am also informed that, in the opinion of Judge Bond and Mr. Hayter, the acting judicial adviser, both members of the Court, the first six prisoners would undoubtedly have been found guilty of murder by a British jury. The Special Court was composed of the Egyptian Minister for Foreign Affairs, who has had several years experience in the ministry of justice, and is Acting Minister of Justice in the absence of the latter; Mr. Bond, Vice-President of the Native Court of Appeal, whose position is practically that of Lord Chief Justice; Fathig Bey, President of the Cairo Native Court; Mr. Hayter, Acting Judicial Adviser, formerly a judge in the Soudan; and Colonel Ludlow, officiating Judge-Advocate. There is no legal power of interference on the part either of the Egyptian Government or of the British Agency with the execution of the decision of the Court, and I am confident that the character of the tribunal is the greatest safeguard possible against a miscarriage of justice.

Case of Mr. Cecil Bisset.

MR. THOMASSON (Leicester): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that Mr. Cecil Bisset, son of the late General J. J. Bisset, was in 1901 commissioned by Lord Roberts to raise a force of thirty Boers; that Mr. Cecil Bisset, having done this, was, on October 17th, 1901, ordered summarily to leave Kroonstad; that, on his reporting himself at Bloemfontein, he was told by Colonel Benson, military secretary to General Kelly-Kenny, that there were no charges against him, but that he could not be allowed to be in the same district with Captain de Bertodana; that a claim by Mr. Cecil Bisset for losses subsequent on his being thus obliged to leave was investigated at Kroonstad on May 1st, 1903; that Lord Milner, on May 13th, 1905, informed Mr. Cecil Bisset that his claim had been disallowed; that Mr. Cecil Bisset appealed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, alleging in substance that he had been made the victim of misrepresentations by Captain de Bertodana; that the late Secretary of State for the Colonies replied that he could not interfere in the matter; whether he can say if, since this decision, it has been ascertained that there was another Mr. C. Bisset, engaged at the time in question in procuring cattle for the same firm that employed Mr. Cecil Bisset for the same purpose; that some confusion has arisen from these two similarly occupied persons both bearing the name of C. Bisset; and whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies will now give his attention to this matter, with the view of finding out whether wrong has been done to Mr. Cecil Bisset.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The statements made in the first half of the Question were made in the appeal to the late Secretary of State, and Mr. Lyttelton saw no reason for interfering with the decision to disallow the claims, having been informed by the Governor, Sir Arthur Lawley, that Mr. Bisset's claim was investigated and rejected by the resident magistrate; that this finding was confirmed by the Central Judicial Commission, that the Commission subsequently, upon representations made by Mr. Bisset, again reviewed the claim but was satisfied that the original decision was proper, and that he, the Governor, approved the decision. It appears that Mr. Bisset received a commission in one of the local corps for which he drew pay in the ordinary manner. He was at the same time in the pay of Weil as an agent for the aquisition of cattle, and he also was himself dealing in cattle, his own evidence on the matter being clear. I have no knowledge that it has been ascertained, since the late Secretary of State arrived at his decision, that there were two Mr. Bisset's employed by Weil, and, as at present advised, the Secretary of State does not see how it would affect the decision, but he will ask the Governor to report upon the statement that there were two persons of the name in Weil's employ.

Compensation for Accidents to Postal Employees on Travelling Post Offices.

MR. STEADMAN (Finsbury, Central): To ask the Postmaster-General what are the arrangements between the Post Office and the railway companies for paying any compensation on account of accident that may be awarded to postal employees while engaged on the travelling post office; whether, in the event of damages being given to a postal servant in a court of law on account of such accidents, the post office pay a proportion of such damages; and, if so, what is the proportion.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The arrangements are not always the same, but in most cases any compensation awarded is paid by the railway companies.

Reduction of Mr. F. Gates, South-Western District Post Office.

MR. STEADMAN: To ask the Postmaster-General what are the grounds upon which the overseer, Mr. F. Gates, of the South-Western District Office has been reduced to the sorter's ranks; whether he is aware that this officer has over thirty-three years service, during eighteen of which he has been an overseer; will he say whether Mr. Gates has been called upon to explain any unsatisfactory conduct during his service as a supervisor; and will he inquire into the whole circumstances of this officer's career, with a view to his reinstatement as an overseer.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have twice given careful consideration to the case of Mr. Gates and inquired into all the circumstances of his career, and I regret that I do not see my way to reinstate him.

Telegraphic Delays at Bristol.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the telegraphic delays which are taking place at the Bristol office: whether it is on official record that on a recent occasion 120 pages of Press telegrams were waiting transcription owing to shortage of staff; whether messages which should be transmitted to sub-offices are delivered by messengers from the head office and delay incurred, owing to the insufficiency of telegraphists to man the circuits; and whether, in the interests of the public service, he will personally investigate the administration of this office.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) My attention was called to the matter, and I am having a special investigation made into the matters referred to by the hon. Member, and I will communicate the result to him.

Poor Law Children in Workhouses.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the number of Poor Law children now in the workhouses and workhouse infirmaries of the Metropolis and the provinces, respectively, differentiating between those under and those above the age of three years.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) On January 1st, 1906, the latest date for which information is available, the numbers of pauper children relieved in workhouses and workhouse infirmaries in England and Wales were as follows:—

	Number of children chargeable to Poor Law Unions in London.	Number of children chargeable to Poor Law Unions outside London.	Total.
(a) Not including insane and idiots:—
1. In workhouses, otherwise than in infirm wards -	1,023	13,543	14,566
2. In infirm wards or infirmaries - - -	2,061	4,899	6,960
(b) Insane and idiots in workhouses† - - -	5	288	293

† There were also 156 children chargeable to London Unions in district sick asylums and 756 children in the imbecile asylums belonging to the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum Districts.

The number of children under three years of age chargeable to Poor Law unions in London in the workhouses, on January 6th, was 737, and in infirmaries 916. The numbers above the age of three years were on the same date 371 and 1,015 respectively. Similar information with regard to the rest of England and Wales is not available.

National Vaccine Establishments stock of Lymph.

SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will grant a Return showing, as far as is known, the original sources of the various stocks of lymph which have been, or are being, employed by the National Vaccine Establishment, indicating those strains which are no longer in current use.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) As I have stated in reply to previous Questions, the usual method of renewing lymph, supplied from the National Vaccine Establishment, is by vaccinating calves with vaccine lymph obtained from children, but in some instances the lymph has been obtained from abroad, and in such cases it would usually not be practicable to give its original sources. In these circumstances I do not think that a Parliamentary Return of any value could be given. I may, however, state that in no case is lymph used at the establishment unless it has been passed through a series of calves.

Report of Ecclesiastical Disorders Commission

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Report of the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Disorders will be in the hands of Members.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The Report is in the hands of the printers, and will, I hope, be ready for distribution at the beginning of next week.

Education Bill—State-aided Schools.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): To ask the President of the Board of Education if the State-aided schools founded by Clause 4 of the Education Bill are public elementary schools.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) As I stated yesterday, the point referred to in the Question is under consideration and I am not yet prepared to give an answer. The main general conditions of Parliamentary grants will certainly be applied to them, and the point is, therefore, not much more than one of terminology.

Rebuilding of Cules National Schools.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Cules, county Fermanagh, national school has been for several years in a dilapidated state; that the local education authority, on the ground of its condition, refuse to enforce attendance of children at it; that a grant for rebuilding has been applied for, the necessary local contribution having been raised, and that a very small grant was offered by the Commissioners, and was withdrawn on the ground that a new scheme for plans and grants was under consideration, and can he say when this new scheme will be published, and if any arrangement can be made to enable the Cules school to be carried on, as it is a large one attended by children of all religious denominations in the district.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that their inspector has reported the schoolhouse in question to be unsuitable for educational purposes. The Commissioners have no information as to the effect mentioned in the second inquiry. The Commissioners, on the manager's application, sanctioned in the first instance a grant of £201 for a new schoolhouse according to Plan No. I. to accommodate sixty pupils, but on the manager representing that he desired to have a schoolhouse for eighty pupils according to Plan II. the Commissioners agreed, on condition that the extra expense would be borne from local sources. The Commissioners have not withdrawn the grant, but they informed the manager that they could not sanction the supplemental grant for which he applied until the revised scheme of building plans and estimates should be settled. The Government are doing everything they can to hasten the settlement of this matter.

Irish Land Act—Section 23 (11)—Percentage Scale.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have yet framed a percentage scale of fees, under Section 23 (11) of the Land Act of 1903; and whether it is proposed to publish particulars of the negotiation fees sanctioned under the provisions of that Act.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The scale of fees in question has not yet been settled, but each case which arises is dealt with on its merits by the Estates Commissioners. The forthcoming Report of the Commissioners will contain information on the subject.

Catholic Catechist at Armagh Union Schools.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain why the Local Government Board sanctioned the grant of a pension of £15 to the Protestant teacher and catechist to the Armagh union, but refused to sanction the pension of £9 voted to the Catholic assistant teacher and catechist; whether the Local Government Board refused to sanction the appointment of Miss O'Reilly as Catholic catechist, and, if so, on what grounds; whether the Catholic children are in charge of a non-Catholic matron, that night and morning prayers have to be recited by a pauper, and that the children have to be educated in the town schools: whether the Local Government Board have power to insist upon the appointment of a Catholic catechist; and whether they intend to make any attempt to relieve the present deadlock.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Local Government Board did not refuse to sanction a pension to Miss McKee, the assistant teacher, who acted as Catholic catechist. The guardians proposed, on July 29th, 1902, to abolish the office of schoolmistress, which was held by a Protestant, and that of assistant teacher, and to grant the holders superannuation allowances of £15 and £9 respectively, as compensation for loss of office, the workhouse children being sent to extern schools. The Board did not consent to these proposals, as they considered the arrangement objectionable, unless it were shown that the children were to be properly superintended before and after school hours. Despite the Board's protest, the guardians subsequently dispensed with the services of Miss McKee, and the Board had no power to prevent them from doing so. In September, 1903, the schoolmistress resigned on the grounds of permanent infirmity, and, with the Board's approval, was awarded a pension of £20 a year in respect of her service of twenty-four years. The Local Government Board did not refuse to sanction the appointment of Miss O'Reilly as Roman Catholic catechist. The guardians appointed her as Roman Catholic attendant, and while the Board were in correspondence with the guardians and the chaplain as to her duties she resigned, having accepted another situation. The matron is a Protestant. It is the duty of the master to make arrangements for the recital of morning and evening prayers. The workhouse children attend outside schools, where they presumably receive religious instruction. The Local Government Board have no power, under the existing regulations, to compel the guardians to appoint a Roman Catholic catechist.

Irish Land Purchase—Case of John Duffy.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that John Duffy Attymon, county Galway, a tenant on the Dunsandle Estate, signed an agreement to purchase his holding at the time the sale of the property took place; that the agreement specified that the annual rent for the purpose of purchase would be £14 per year; and that the Commissioners now threaten to nullify the agreement and increase the rent from £14 to £16 a year within fourteen days unless the tenant surrenders to them a portion of his land; and whether, seeing that the disputed land was before the County Court and the Court of Assizes, presided over by Lord Justice Holmes, who gave a verdict and costs in favour of Mr. Duffy, he will explain why the Estates Commissioners threaten this tenant with a deprivation of his rights; and by what right or authority do they threaten to increase his rent from £14, the sum mentioned in the agreement, to £16.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that John Duffy signed an undertaking to purchase his holding, comprising 43½ acres held at a rent of £16, for the sum of £336. The price at which the Commissioners were prepared to sell to Duffy was fixed at this low sum on condition that a passage through the holding for other purchasers should be reserved. Duffy has refused to allow this passage to be used, and on April 24th last the Commissioners informed him that if he should persist in this refusal they might decline to sell the holding to him, in which case he would remain tenant at the rent of £16.

Wireless Telegraphy in the Army and Navy.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary of State for War what system of wireless telegraphy is being adopted for the Army; and whether the Navy using the Marconi apparatus are free from any agreements or impediments as regards intercommunication between the two systems.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The War Department are experimenting with the Lodge Muirhead and another system, but are not committed to the exclusive adoption of either. The Admiralty may not communicate from Admiralty shore stations in the United Kingdom by Marconi's system with any other system used by the War Department, except during war time or case of emergency; but there would be no technical difficulty in such communication.

Pay of Government Employees attending Volunteer Camps.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): To ask the Secretary of State for War, whether the men in the Government employ at the Royal Gunpowder Factory at Waltham Abbey and the Royal Small Arms Factory at Enfield, who recently attended the volunteer camp of the Bedfordshire Brigade, were stopped their week's pay in consequence of their so doing; and, if so, whether he will give an undertaking that, in future, these men shall have made good to them the deficiency between their week's pay and their camp allowance, 10s. 2d.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The pay of men employed in the Ordnance factories attending Volunteer camps is stopped during the period of their absence from work, unless they are entitled to leave with pay and can arrange to take such leave while at the camps. It must be remembered that on an emergency the services of these men would be far more urgently required in the factories than as Volunteers.

Sunday Performances of Military Bands.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he can explain under what circumstances the band of the 1st Royal Irish Fusiliers performed a programme at Bray Head, county Wicklow, on Sunday afternoon, the 23rd ultimo; and whether military bands are fulfilling part of the Army Regulations in giving Sunday performances.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Military bands are permitted to play on Sundays between the hours of 2 p.m. and 9.30 p.m., subject to certain special conditions.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Admiralty Clerks.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state the reasons for the increase in the staff employed in Admiralty work under Vote 12 since the Navy Estimates of 1904–5, being an increase from sixty-eight to eighty-one officials in the Secretary's department, from 314 to 360 in the department of the Controller of the Navy, and 261 to 290 in the Accountant-General's department; whether the Admiralty Vote for salaries and allowances has gone up from £306,217 in 1904–5 to £329,809 in 1906–7, seeing that there has been a reduction both in the numbers of ships and personnel administered during the period.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The increase in the Secretary's department amounts to three only, the provision in 1906–7 including ten extra clerks provided for in 1904–5 under Subhead B. Of the increase of forty-six in the Controller's department, thirty-one are under the Constructive Branches—being principally drawing staff borne temporarily additional to March 31st, 1907, for work in connection with the "Dreadnought" and new cruiser designs. The development of the Electrical Engineer's department, and the increase of professional work generally account for the remainder. The increase in the Accountant-General's department is almost entirely in the subordinate staff. The reduction in the number of ships and personnel affects only a section of the Department, and even that is more than counterbalanced by increase in the complexity of the work and the shortening of the period of commissions. The increase in the total Estimate is not wholly due to additional numbers. No small part of it is due to progressive increases within the various scales of salary. These are somewhat heavy owing to the staff being comparatively junior.

The Admiralty and the Marconi Company.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will take steps to lay before Parliament the agreement dated July 24th, 1903, between the Admiralty and Marconi's Wireless Telegraph Company, which agreement is referred to in the agreement between the Postmaster-General and the Marconi's Wireless Telegraph Company, Limited, and the Marconi International Marine Communication Company, Limited, dated August 11th, 1904, and ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on April 11th, 1906.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Answer is in the affirmative. I hope that the agreement will be in the hands of Members early next week.

Sleeping Sickness at Entebbe.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the continued prevalence and fatal character of sleeping sickness about Entebbe, he will consider the advisability of removing the seat of Government from there to Kampala, the ancient and more convenient capital, and less exposed to the disease.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): We have not been led to form the opinion that Kampala would be a more convenient capital or less exposed to the disease of sleeping sickness.

Uganda—Sleeping Sickness.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if any steps are being taken in Uganda to prevent the spread of sleeping sickness by drawing cordons round infected districts, by destroying the breeding places of the particular fly that carries the disease, or especially by discouraging settlement round the lake or by stagnant water.

MR. CHURCHILL: The very full and careful investigations which, as the hon. Member is no doubt aware, are being conducted under the supervision of the Royal Society do not indicate that it will be practicable to prevent the spread of sleeping sickness by the methods referred to in the Question. The Secretary of State is advised that the only means of arresting the spread of the disease which would be practicable would be by the discovery of some treatment, curative or preventive, capable of being applied to man. This matter is now engaging the attention of the Tropical Diseases Committee of the Royal Society.

Lake Victoria—Sleeping Sickness.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary for the Colonies if he is aware of the fact that sleeping sickness has almost depopulated the islands in Lake Victoria; that recently a forest concession has been granted of a large island there; and if, in order to save natives from risk of death from employment on the concession, and to prevent the spreading still further of the disease, stringent instructions will be transmitted to the Commissioner.

MR. CHURCHILL: It is lamentably true that sleeping sickness is rife on Lake Victoria, though I cannot say whether any islands have been actually depopulated. No report of the concession referred to by my hon. friend has yet been received.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Will this fact be borne in mind before further concessions are granted, seeing that such grants only mean sending the natives to their death?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir, that will be most carefully considered.

Chinese Coolies in South Africa—The Repatriation Proclamation.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has yet obtained a translation of the original proclamation to the Chinese labourers in the Transvaal; and, if so, whether, and in what respects, it differs from the notice read to the House on 3rd May last.†

MR. CHURCHILL: I have obtained a translation which shows that the proclamation as posted in Chinese in the mines was a fair and accurate translation of the text read by me to the House, and differed from it only in the formal addition at the end, which it is usual to omit in translations from the Chinese.

MR. BOTTOMLEY asked who had made the translation, and whether steps had been taken to ascertain whether any considerable number of Chinese coolies could read even their own language.

MR. CHURCHILL said the translation would shortly be presented to Parliament in a Blue-book, and hon. Members could then compare the two versions for themselves. The translator was the official translator at the Foreign Office. Chinese illiterates, he understood, had the document read to them by their comrades.

† See (4) Debates, clvi., 706.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has the hon. Gentleman any idea of the number of Chinese illiterates at the mines?

MR. CHURCHILL: No, Sir.

MR. BOTTOMLEY: Had the Chinese translator at the Foreign Office before him the version read to the House last May by the hon. Gentleman?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, and the Blue-book will give the details line by line of the two versions.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): Will the hon. Gentleman have the proclamation delivered to the Chinese orally?

*MR. SPEAKER: That does not arise out of the Question.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether an amended proclamation as to the repatriation of Chinese coolies is to be issued, and, if so, what are to be the terms.

MR. CHURCHILL: The question of an amended proclamation is under consideration, but I am not yet able to make any more definite statement on the subject. Perhaps my hon. and gallant friend will repeat his Question in the early days of next week.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): May I ask the hon. Gentleman if in preparing the new proclamation he will bear in mind that it is impossible to keep men at this kind of work without some form of torture?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not connected with the Question on the Paper.

The Johannesburg "Standard and Diggers' News."

MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the independent expert employed by Lord Selborne to ascertain what would be a fair and reasonable payment in respect of the use of Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's premises and plant by the military authorities was Mr. Fairbridge, the manager of the Argus Printing Company of Johannesburg, a company opposed to Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce, proprietors of the late Johannesburg Standard and Diggers' News in the pre-war days; whether he is aware that the most recent and previous annual balance sheets of the Argus Company, his own company, show that 10 per cent. and 15 per cent. per annum are the amounts allowed for depreciation of plant and machinery; and whether, upon that basis, the depreciation in the value of the Harrison Street plant and machinery belonging to Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce, and valued at £18,000 in 1900, should stand at £2,400 to £3,600, and not at £800 as valued by the independent expert, Mr. Fairbridge.

MR. CHURCHILL: Mr. Fairbridge was employed by Lord Selborne, and his valuation of £800 as compensation for the occupation of the Harrison Street premises was confirmed by another expert, a property valuator of Johannesburg, who was recommended to the Transvaal Government as a valuator of wide experience. I have not seen the balance sheets of the Argus Company, but I understand that, whilst some time ago 1 per cent. per month was written off on machinery, this rate was discovered to be far too high, and that the present rate of 6 per cent. per annum will have to be lowered.

MR. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will lay upon the Table a Return of the Transvaal Auditor-General's balance sheet and profit and loss account dealing with Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's properties, plant, and printing offices, showing a profit of £19,855 15s. 4d., after crediting Mendelssohn and Bruce with £4,895 as an amount due to them as assessed by the Auditor-General.

MR. CHURCHILL: Isolated documents of this character cannot be published with advantage. The correspondence on this question under the late Government has been protracted and is in part confidential. Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce appear to have stated from the outset that they themselves had not declared a dividend since the formation of the firm. The case of the Government of the Transvaal rests partly upon the fact that no profits at all could have been earned by the machinery of Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce during a period of war and censorship, except through its employment for official purposes. Mr. Mendelssohn's last letter containing his reasoned protest against the award of £2,500 is being referred to the Governor of the Transvaal, with whose Government the obligation of meeting the claim rests; and that protest will receive fair consideration.

Crime among the Chinese Coolies.

MAJOR SEELY: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the continued danger to life and property caused by the Chinese coolies on the Witwatersrand and adjacent areas in the Transvaal, His Majesty's Government will consider the propriety of stopping any further importation under the 8,000 permits still outstanding, or of imposing a time limit in the near future, after which all importation shall cease.

MR. CHURCHILL: His Majesty's Government are led to believe that the improvements which are being carried out in the management and control of the Chinese labourers will not prove ineffective in preventing the dangers mentioned. The question of fixing a time limit after which all importation under existing permits shall cease will be considered.

MAJOR SEELY: What are the improvements referred to in the Answer?

MR. CHURCHILL: If the hon. Member had been constant in his attendance at Question time he would have heard me read out a list, one day last week, I think it was.†

MAJOR SEELY: I have been constantly here.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): When will these changes be considered? It is long since they were promised. Does the Secretary of State fully appreciate the profound dissatisfaction at the delay——

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice must be given of that Question.

MAJOR SEELY: May I say neither I nor my friends around me understand what the Under-Secretary is proposing in the form of improvements?

MR. CHURCHILL: I will refer hon. Members to the Answer I gave to a Question on the subject last week.†

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) asked whether, in view of the fact that these licences were issued last November, it was not nearly time the importations fell short.

MR. CHURCHILL: I think it is nearly time.

MR. PAUL (Northampton): Who is to pay the cost of the improvements?

MR. CHURCHILL: The cost of the improvements which involve expenditure of money will fall on the mine-owners themselves.

The Cason Mining Company.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the name of the individual who forwarded to the authorities the evidence on which the charge was framed against the manager of the Cason Mining Company, and who demanded his prosecution.

MR. CHURCHILL: I have at present no official information, but a report upon the case has been called for by telegraph and will reach us by mail.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the prosecution of the manager of the Cason Mining Company for cruelty to a Chinese coolie took place with the authority, or at the instance of, the Colonial Office; if so, on what evidence was such prosecution ordered; and what steps the Government propose to take to recompense the manager for the mistake made.

MR. CHURCHILL: The prosecution took place without the cognisance of the Colonial Office.

Coolie Riot in the Nourse Mine.

MR. MOND (Chester): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has made inquiries concerning the riot caused by 400 Chinese coolies in the Nourse Mine, and what is the result of such inquiries.

MR. CHURCHILL: Inquiry has been made by mail, but if the hon. Member is anxious for early information, the Secretary of State will telegraph.

Coolie Outrages in South Africa.

MR. MOND: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state what steps the Government intend to take to stop the continuance of almost daily outrages on the white population by Chinese coolies; and whether the Government will cause legislation to be introduced into the Legislative Council of the Transvaal, rendering the employers responsible in damages for outrages committed by coolies in their employ.

MR. CHURCHILL: It is the hope of His Majesty's Government that the measures recently recommended by the Committee which considered the question,† a copy of whose Report will be laid before Parliament with other Papers, will check the outrages, which are the work of a small section of the Chinese. The question of amending the laws of the Transvaal in such a way as to make the importers of indentured labourers responsible in damages for the good behaviour of such labourers during their period of service is one which evidently calls for the attention of Ministers responsible to a Transvaal Parliament. In view of the advent of such an assembly His Majesty's Government do not propose to initiate such legislation themselves.

"Tremble and Obey."

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if, when the terms of the Transvaal Labour Ordinance were first posted at the recruiting stations in China, the Chinese equivalent for tremble and obey constituted part of such posters.

MR. CHURCHILL: The posting of the Labour Ordinance in China did not constitute a proclamation under the local authority; and, in the circumstances, it seems not unlikely, though the Secretary of State has no certain information, that the admonitions which usually conclude official proclamations did not form a part of the notice.

MR. J. WARD: Have any further requests been made for repatriation beyond the jury of twelve already announced?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes; forty-three labourers in all have applied according to the latest report, and we are expecting a further report very shortly.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS: What is the distinction between an ordinary proclamation and one issued under the Labour Ordinance?

MR. CHURCHILL: I suppose there is a difference between notices issued by mine-owners inviting labour and those issued under the authority of the Government.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS: Was not the Labour Ordinance a Government document?

MR. CHURCHILL: Those published in China certainly were not.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): What is the use of sending forty-three labourers back to China if you admit 8,000 more into South Africa?

British Guiana.

MR. J. WARD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Lord Elgin has replied to the public petition of the inhabitants of British Guiana; and whether he intends to grant a commission of inquiry into the grievances contained in such petition, or otherwise take action to remove the complaints of the inhabitants.

† See (4) Debates, clviii, 1361.

MR. CHURCHILL: Pending the publication of Papers on this subject, which will include the text of the petition together with a despatch from the Secretary of State comprising a full and categorical reply to the complaints of the petitioners, I am unable to add anything to the Answer which I gave to a similar Question by the hon. Member for North Salford on 26th instant.†

West Africa—Alcoholic Imports.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary for the Colonies if his attention has been directed to the proportion of revenue derived from the importation of rum and gin to West Africa, and the sale of the same to the natives, and to the legislation of New Zealand, and other countries, on the subject; and if he will take advantage of the presence of the Governors of North and South Nigeria to consult and consider how the traffic can, if not put an end to, at least be minimised.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State is watching with close attention the traffic which is the subject of the hon. Member's Questions. There is no need to discuss restrictive measures with the High Commissioner of Northern Nigeria; for the sale and importation of spirits in that Protectorate is already absolutely prohibited. The state of the law in Southern Nigeria and in Lagos, where existing conditions are more complex, will fall within the discussions of the International Liquor Conference to be held at Brussels in the autumn of this year; and the Secretary of State prefers to await the result of that Conference before taking new decisions.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Is the hon. Gentleman aware a large proportion of the revenues of Northern Nigeria is derived from the charges on these drinks?

MR. CHURCHILL'S Answer was inaudible.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Does the prohibition apply to both black and whites?

MR. CHURCHILL asked for notice of that Question. In answer to a further Question, the hon. Gentleman said the matter would be further considered after the International Liquor Conference.

Russia and the Aland Islands.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Russian troops have occupied the Aland Islands, in the Gulf of Botnia; and, if so, whether it is intended to take any steps to maintain the provisions of the Treaty of Paris.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): We have no information to show that the Russian Government contemplate any breach of the provisions of the Treaty of Paris by fortifying the Aland Islands, or maintaining or creating military or naval establishments there.

The Russian Massacres.

MR. THORNE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that 70,000 unarmed people are estimated to have been slaughtered by the Russian Government in the Baltic Provinces since the beginning of this year; whether he is cognisant of the fact that the massacres of Jews in Biolostoc were organised by the Russian officials; and if, in view of these facts, the Government will cancel the sending of the British Fleet to Cronstadt.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer to all these Questions is in the negative.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is not the only way this country has of marking its sense of the nature of these occurrences to decline to send the Fleet to Russian ports?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I must refer the hon. Member to the Answer I gave the other day.† I have nothing to add with regard to the movements of the Fleet; but, as I have said, if it is desired that I should make a fuller statement or that I should argue the question, I will do so next Thursday.

† See Col. 768.

The Servian Regicides.

MR. BOTTOMLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, at the time of resuming diplomatic relations with Servia, he was aware that several of the regicides had just been pensioned, with an increase of pay, for very special services rendered to the State, and that others were still occupying important posts at the Servian Court; and whether it was by accident or design that the date chosen for the announcement of the resumption of diplomatic relations was the anniversary of the murder of the late King and Queen.

SIR EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Government made the resumption of diplomatic relations conditional upon the retirement of the principal regicides from posts held by them under the Servian Government, so that their future positions would not bring them into relations with British representatives in Servia. This condition has been complied with, and His Majesty's Government are not concerned with other matters. I was not aware of the fact stated at the end of the Question.

The Attack on British Officers in Egypt.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the recent affray between British officers and Egyptians at Tantah, whether he has yet received any detailed information as to the circumstances which led to the affray; whether any of the natives were killed or injured; if any natives were killed or injured; will the British officers who took part in the affray be tried; whether the pigeons shot on these occasions are tame or wild pigeons; whether pigeon shooting in the neighbourhood of villages is a legal occupation in Egypt; whether in this instance the permission of the head man of the village had been obtained by the officers before they commenced to shoot; what were the special grounds on which the Agent and Consul of Great Britain demanded that the accused Egyptians in this case should be sent for trial before the Special Tribunal; and whether there is any appeal from the Special Tribunal before which the Egyptians are to be tried.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I cannot answer all the details of the hon. Member's Question. I do not know whether any native was killed or injured, but our information is that the British officers, when they were attacked by the natives, gave up their guns and refused to fire in self-defence, and if any natives were killed, it was clearly not by the action of the British officers. When a report appeared in the Press yesterday, I telegraphed to know what the sentences were, and what were the facts established at the trial, saying that it was desirable we should know them before any death sentences were executed. The information I received is as follows:—The sentences were as stated in the Press. With regard to the trial, the prisoners were defended by three of the best known native advocates, who had a full hearing. The Court was unanimous as regards the prisoners found guilty, and the evidence clearly established premeditation and concerted action. Thirty-one of the prisoners were acquitted, and twenty-one were found guilty. The Court expressed its opinion that the British officers had behaved with extreme forbearance and self-restraint. The chief attack took place after they had given up their guns, and was persisted in with great brutality. I am also informed that, in the opinion of Judge Bond and Mr. Hayter, the Acting Judicial Adviser, both members of the Court, the first six prisoners would undoubtedly have been found guilty of murder by a British jury. The Special Court was composed of the Egyptian Minister for Foreign Affairs, who has had several years experience in the Ministry of Justice, and is acting Minister of Justice in the absence of the latter; Mr. Bond, Vice-President of the Native Court of Appeal, whose position is practically that of Lord Chief Justice; Fathig Bey, President of the Cairo Native Court; Mr. Hayter, Acting Judicial Adviser, formerly a Judge in the Soudan; and Colonel Ludlow, officiating Judge Advocate. There is no legal power of interference on the part either of the Egyptian Government or of the British agency with the execution of the decision of the Court, and I am confident that the character of the tribunal is the greatest safeguard possible against a miscarriage of justice.

MR. DILLON pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman had not said whether it was legal or illegal to shoot these pigeons in native villages, whether they were the property of the villagers, and whether a native woman was wounded or killedbefore the officers were attacked.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I understand that no one was wounded or killed before the officers were attacked, but that, after the guns had been given up by the officers, one of the guns was let off and caused injury to, I think, four people, including one woman. But that was not by the officers. With regard to pigeon shooting, I understand that pigeons are never to be shot except with the consent of the headman of the village. In this case the officers arrived in the carriage of the local magnate and assumed that a complete understanding had taken place. As to the future, it is quite clear that, after such a serious accident as this, there should be no more pigeon shooting, and I understand that instructions were given some time ago that it should cease.

MR. PAUL asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would consider the possibility of procuring through Lord Cromer the remission of the floggings that formed part of the sentences in this case.

MR. BYLES asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had any information as to whether the persons sentenced to death had been executed, and, if not, whether, in all the circumstances of the case, it was impossible yet to save their lives [Cries of "Oh,"] inasmuch as the nature of the fracas did not indicate murder in the sense in which we in England understood it.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have not actually heard whether the death sentences have been carried out, but they were to be executed at two o'clock this afternoon according to Egyptian time. I assume, therefore, that that has already taken place. With regard to the character of the crime, two of the Judges were men with English knowledge as well as experience in Egyptian law, and they stated that, in their opinion, not only four but six of the natives would have been convicted of murder by a British jury. I understand that the sentences of flogging were to be executed immediately; but, with regard to the general question, I quite sympathise with my hon. friend's feeling, which is shared by a large number of people, as to the desirability of watching sentences of the kind very closely. I do not know the extent to which flogging is possible under Egyptian law, but I propose to take the opportunity of discussing that when Lord Cromer is in England, with a view to knowing to what extent it is possible, and whether any change is desirable.

Whisky.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience caused to the trade by the failure, owing to the absence of a full bench of magistrates, to arrive at a definite decision in the recent appeal at the Newington County Sessions Court with regard to the nature of whisky; and whether he proposes to take any steps to secure a determination of the point at issue in this action.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): Whisky as such is not known to the Revenue Laws. The Excise duties upon the different kinds of spirit sold as whisky are the same. I am not interested, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the definition of the word, nor is there any way in which as Chancellor of the Exchequer I could raise the question for legal decision.

Income-Tax.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that many large traders at the Earl's Court Exhibition and other places have no permanent premises in this country, and consequently, in many cases, escape the payment of income-tax; and whether he proposes to take any action for the protection of the revenue in such cases.

MR. ASQUITH: The question of the liability of the traders referred to has not been lost sight of by the local income-tax officials, but, having regard to the heavy expenses which exhibitors are at, and the difficulty there would be in collecting any duty assessed—the Exhibition being open only from May 1st to October 1st—no assessments have been raised other than on persons who have occupied stalls from year to year. A proportion of the principal exhibitors have London branches or agencies, and in those cases the profits fall for assessment in the usual way.

Prosecutions for Food Adulteration at Leicester.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to two cases of prosecution for adulteration which came before the Leicester magistrates, who fined a woman just started in business in a small shop £10 for adulterating butter, and who imposed upon a grocer long established in business £5 also for adulterating butter, and for, at the same time, obstructing the inspector; and whether he will state what action the Home Office proposes to take in the matter.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Yes, Sir; and I have been in communication with the justices on the subject. On the facts submitted, I am unable to see how the £5 can be justified if the £10 fine was just. But I have no power to raise the amount of a fine. As regards the £10 fine, which was paid at once, while I think, under the circumstances, it was severe, the severity did not appear to me quite to justify interference, having regard to the necessity which exists in the public interest to deal effectively with offences against the Food and Drugs Act.

Vivisection.

MR. G. GREENWOOD (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the fact that the recently issued Return of Experiments on Living Animals for the year 1905 shows an increase of no less than 5,373 of such experiments as compared with the Return for 1904; whether he knows any reason to account for this increase; and whether he can now say when the Commission to inquire into the matter of vivisection will be appointed, and what the terms of reference to such Commission will be.

*MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. friend will see from the Return that nearly the whole of the increase in the number of experiments—5,083 out of the total of 5,373—is accounted for by the additional inoculations, hypodermic injections, and feeding experiments which have been made. The increase is due to the greater importance attached to biological tests in practical medicine, and to the greater number of these experiments which are performed on behalf of local and other public authorities. With regard to the composition and terms of reference of the proposed Royal Commission, I hope to be able to make an announcement very shortly.

MR. G. GREENWOOD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state why a change has been made in the form of the Return of Experiments on Living Animals, viz., that the recently issued Return for the year 1905 does not purport to distinguish, as did former Returns, between painless and painful experiments.

*MR. GLADSTONE: The change was made because it is found impracticable to make a separation between painful and painless experiments. In some cases it is impossible for anyone, even the operator or observer, to say whether pain is caused or not. It is, of course, important to ascertain and to indicate the extent to which pain is caused to animals by experiment, and the inspector's report, which precedes the Return, gives this information as far as possible with regard to particular classes of experiments.

Metropolitan Police at Ascot.

DR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any of the Metropolitan Police were employed in maintaining order at Ascot during the race meeting, and, if any, how many; and whether any of the cost of such duty will be defrayed out of the Metropolitan Police rate.

*MR. GLADSTONE: The Metropolitan Police were engaged in maintaining order at Ascot during the race meeting, the numbers employed on this duty being, on the 19th, 563; 20th, 506; 21st, 628; and on the 22nd, 456. The cost will not fall on the Metropolitan Police rate.

DR. COOPER asked on whose authority the Metropolitan Police were called upon to do duty at the expense of the ratepayers nine miles beyond the boundary of the Metropolitan Police area.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I have already said the cost does not fall on the metropolitan rate. As regards the practice, I can only say it has been carried on for a great number of years, and this is the first time my attention has been called to it. I cannot say exactly on whose authority the police are sent.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland) asked who paid the cost.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I understand that the principal cost is borne by the Master of the Buckhounds and the railway company.

MR. THORNE asked if the police received extra pay for their extra duty.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware that it is extra duty.

MR. MORTON asked if the Master of the Buckhounds received payment from the public funds.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware.

MR. PAUL: Has not the office of Master of the Buckhounds been abolished ?

[No Answer was returned]

Defaulting Solicitors.

MR. BOTTOMLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state why, in the recent Return under the Prosecution of Offences Acts, 1879 to 1884, under the heading of Defaulting Solicitors, one case is referred to as Rex v. ———, acquitted, whilst in all other cases the names of acquitted persons are published.

*MR. GLADSTONE: The name of the solicitor in question is given in its proper place on page 15 of Return. The Director of Public Prosecutions very properly avoided giving it special prominence in the introductory note from which the hon. Member quotes.

Lead Poisoning in the Coach-Making Trade.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the increase in the number of cases of lead poisoning in the coach-making industry for the five months ending May, 1906, the number being thirty-five as compared with nineteen for the corresponding period of 1905; whether he can apportion the number of cases in factories and workshops respectively; and whether he proposes to establish any additional precautions by way of special rules or otherwise.

*MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; the number of cases in the first five months of 1905 was, however, exceptionally small, the average for the corresponding periods of the six years 1901–6 inclusive, being twenty-six. Of thirty-five cases which took place in the first five months of 1906, twenty-seven occurred in factories and eight in workshops. The question of framing regulations is under my consideration.

Cement Factories—Workmen's Shelters.

MR. J. WARD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the generally low standard of sanitation prevailing and the complete want of proper shelters for workmen in cement factories throughout the country; and whether he has power under the Factory Acts to cause such factories to be properly inspected; and, if not, whether he proposes to introduce legislation dealing with the subject.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware that the standard of sanitation in cement works generally is low. Cement works are, of course, dusty, and the maintenance of cleanliness is not easy. I will call for special reports on the subject. As regards inspection, the inspectors have the same powers under the Factory Act in regard to cement works as they have in regard to other classes of factories and workshops. I have no reason to suppose that these are insufficient in the case of cement works.

Census of Production —Proposed Inclusion of Agricultural Products.

MR. BECK (Cambridgeshire, Wisbech): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider the advisability of including agricultural produce in the Census of Production Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I am in communication with the President of the Board of Agriculture on the subject. My impression is that much of the information with regard to agricultural production which would be required for the Census is already collected by the Board of Agriculture.

Island of Cumbrae Steamer Service.

*MR. LAMONT (Buteshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to notices published on June 23rd by the Glasgow and South Western Railway Company and by the Caledonian Steam Packet Company to the effect that on and after July 2nd next, their steamers will cease to call at Millport and Keppel Piers, in the Island of Cumbrae; whether he has received any protest from the local authority of Millport against the withdrawal of these steamer services, whereby alone communication with the mainland is maintained, as disastrous to the interests of the inhabitants; whether he has made any representation to the companies on the subject, and, if so, what answer they have made; whether he is aware that the local authority has offered to refer to arbitration any point in dispute, and that the companies have refused and insist that unless the local authority unconditionally accepts their terms the services will be discontinued; and whether he will take action to avert the withdrawal of the steamer service.

MR. RAINY (Kilmarnock Burghs): I beg also to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the threatened cessation of the steamer service to Millport on Saturday next will prevent dwellers in other towns from obtaining access to houses they have acquired in Millport as summer residences; and what action he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: In reply to my hon. friends I regret that I am at present unable to add to the Answer which I gave yesterday to the Question in this matter addressed to me by the hon. Member for North Londonderry.†

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): Does not this show the necessity for the nationalisation of our railways, so that they may be carried on for the advantage of the public?

*MR. SPEAKER: That hardly arises out of the Question.

London Tramway Service.

DR. COOPER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the isolation of certain districts of the county of London from the tramway service of the London County Council owing to the use by some of the metropolitan borough councils of the right of vetoing projected tramway schemes; and whether he has or will consider the advisability of abolishing at an early date this power, and also the power to decide what form of traction shall be used.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am fully aware of the disadvantages to the tramway service of London arising from the rights of veto possessed by the metropolitan borough councils both under Standing Orders and under the Tramways Act, but I am not at present in a position to make any further statement in the matter. With regard to the method of traction to be employed on the London County Council Tramways, the decision already rests with the Board of Trade under the London County Council Electrical Power Act, 1900.

Joint Stock Companies.

MR. BARRAN (Leeds, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware of the condition of the registers of joint stock companies at Somerset House, dirt and wear having made it impossible to trace the names of many companies, and whether he will have the necessary repairs done or new registers provided.

I beg also to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in consideration of the increased number of persons requiring to visit the search room to see the registers of joint stock companies at Somerset House, he can see his way to having more accommodation provided.

† See Col. 932.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: New registers or indexes with improved desks to facilitate reference to them have been in preparation for some time, and it is expected that the arrangements will be complete in the course of the next three months. The cost of printing the indexes is considerable. They are calculated to last five years, but from their increased bulk and the ever-increasing numbers of persons using them, those at present in use have not lasted so long as usual. The question of increased space for the accommodation and comfort of the large number of persons attending daily to inspect companies' files has been under serious consideration for some time. The Board of Inland Revenue experience a difficulty in the matter as the space at their disposal is limited, but I hope at an early date that such arrangements will be made as will result in obviating, for some years to come, complaints in that direction.

The "Vaderland"—Refusal to Send Information by Wireless Telegraphy.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the alleged refusal of the steamer "Vaderland" to communicate by wireless telegraphy information concerning a derelict which the American vessel "Lebanon" had been sent out by the American Government to destroy; whether steamers fitted with Marconi apparatus are under any agreement not to communicate with other systems; and, if so, whether the Board of Trade intend to take any action in the matter.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The hon. Member will perhaps allow me to answer this Question. I have no information regarding the alleged refusal of the steamer "Vaderland" (which I understand is not a British ship) to communicate with a ship equipped with another system; but such action would in ordinary circumstances be in accordance with the Marconi Company's practice. Proposals for ensuring intercommunication without regard to the system employed will be submitted to the International Conference on Wireless Telegraphy which will meet at Berlin next October.

Cape Mails.

MR. H. D. MCLAREN (Staffordshire, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that inconvenience arises to the mercantile community in Stafford, Birmingham, and other manufacturing centres, owing to the arrival and departure of the Cape mails on the same day, namely, Saturday, causing always a delay of a week in answering letters from South Africa; and whether he will endeavour to arrange with the shipping companies concerned that the incoming mails shall be landed in this country not later than Thursday.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am aware of the inconvenience to which the hon. Member refers, but unfortunately I fear that there is no remedy. Any alteration in the direction indicated would result in serious inconvenience in South Africa.

Sunday Postal Deliveries in Scotland.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will state on what grounds of moral or economic necessity postmen are compelled to deliver letters, newspapers, commercial matter in rural districts in Scotland at certain places and houses, and at certain houses only, on the Sabbath; and if, having regard to the money which would be saved to the country, without any detriment to the public service, he will consider the advisability of discontinuing this Sabbath breaking on the part of the State.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: This subject has engaged the attention of several Parliamentary Committees—the last of which sat in 1887. The present practice under which Sunday deliveries are instituted or discontinued at the request of the representatives of the persons affected is founded upon the recommendations of those Committees, and has worked satisfactorily. There are comparatively very few Sunday posts in rural districts in Scotland, and they are laid out with the view of minimising Sunday labour. The wishes of those postmen who desire exemption from Sunday work are complied with as far as practicable. As I stated in the Post Office debate, I desire to discourage and not to encourage Sunday labour in the Post Office service.

Wireless Telegraphy Bill.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General which day he proposes to take into consideration the Lords' Amendments to the Wireless Telegraphy Bill.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said he did not know when they would be taken, but he believed the Amendments were the outcome of an agreement, and under the circumstances there was a desire to get the Bill through with as little delay as possible.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): Will notice be given when it is intended to bring the Bill in?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I will see what can be done.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: Is not the right hon. Gentleman incorrectly assuming that this is not a highly controversial Bill?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am assuming nothing.

Glasgow Post Office Medical Officers.

MR. CLELAND (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he is now in a position to state the number of medical officers he proposes to appoint to carry out the duties formerly performed by the post office medical officer for Glasgow, and the respective districts he proposes to allocate to each; and whether, having regard to the present position of affairs, he can see his way to expedite the appointments proposed to be made.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I propose to appoint six medical officers for Glasgow. Full particulars of the respective districts can be obtained by candidates from the postmaster of Glasgow. In regard to the latter part of the Question, I have already answered it in reply to the Question of my hon. friend the Member for Buteshire.

*MR. LAMONT (Buteshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he can now see his way to fill the vacant posts of medical officers to the Glasgow Post Office, in order to relieve Scottish Members of the burden of correspondence placed on them by the applications of medical men from all parts of the country.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: As soon as it was possible to decide into how many districts Glasgow should be divided for medical purposes, instructions were at once given that the six vacancies should be advertised in the usual way, and that applications be invited within seven days. These applications are to be sent to the postmaster at Glasgow; and applications already received either locally or at headquarters will be considered, unless, in view of the altered circumstances, they are withdrawn. The appointments will be made as soon as possible, but the number of applicants is enormous, and the selections will necessarily take time. I am anxious to relieve hon. Members of the burden of correspondence thrown upon them in connection with these medical and other appointments for their own sake, and, I may add, for my own also. I ventured to suggest to the House in the debate on the Post Office Estimates that the present system of approaching Members in order that they should bring pressure to bear in regard to those and other appointments was very much to be deprecated, and I hope that I shall have the general support of the House in discouraging the system as far as possible.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has taken into consideration the advisability of appointing one or more female doctors to the position of medical officers to the post office at Glasgow; and if he will now say into how many districts he proposes to divide the appointment.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not think it would be advisable to appoint female medical officers to any of the six districts into which Glasgow will be divided.

Island of Cumbrae Steamers.

*MR. LAMONT: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to notices published on June 23rd by the Glasgow and South Western Railway Company and by the Caledonian Steam Packet Company, that their steamers will cease, on and from July 2nd next, to call at Millport Pier or Keppel Pier, in the Island of Cumbrae; whether these steamers carry His Majesty's mails; if so, whether the Post Office has given any sanction to the withdrawal of the service; and what steps he proposes to take to obtain the delivery of the mails to Millport in the event of the threatened withdrawal of the steamers being carried out.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The steamers referred to are not under my control and no formal intimation of the alterations was sent to me. I understand that the steamers will call at a new landing place on the island from and to which the mails will be taken by horse conveyance. The alterations will have little effect on the postal service.

Education Bill.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if he will shortly lay upon the Table the Memorandum of enactments to be repealed in the schedule of the Education Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. LOUGH, Islington, W.): I hope the Explanatory Memorandum of the reasons for the repeals will be available in the course of next week. The repeals themselves are fully set out in the second schedule.

LORD BALCARRES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education when he will place upon the Paper his suggested Amendments to Clause 6 of the Education Bill.

MR. LOUGH: I must refer the noble Lord to the reply given to an identical Question from the Member for Cambridge University, which was circulated with the Votes this morning.† I have nothing to add to that Answer.

LORD R. CECIL: When will the Amendments to Clause 2 be available?

MR. LOUGH: I cannot say.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, in the event of schools being transferred without rent, to which Clause 4 of the Education Bill applies, the local education authority or the owners will be liable for mortgages or other charges upon such schools.

MR. LOUGH: In the cases referred to in the Question, the liability in question will not be upon the local authority.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if he can state the number of children that are withdrawn from religious instruction in denominational schools, and the percentage that number bears to the children that are taught in those schools.

MR. LOUGH: I have no information on the subject.

MR. HICKS BEACH: Do not the county councils issue such a Return?

MR. LOUGH: We have no information on the point at the Board of Education.

The Department of Public Trustee.

MR. J. HENDERSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General whether he has made any estimate of the number of official appointments throughout the country of assistants, deputies, and clerks, which will be necessary to establish the department of the public trustee; the total amount of the salaries of such officials; the cost of office accommodation and general expenses of the proposed department; and if he will lay such estimate upon the Table of the House.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir JOHN WALTON, Leeds, S.): No such estimate has been made, and it would be premature to make one. I would remind the hon. Member that the services of officials already holding office will be utilised as far as possible for the machinery of the Bill.

Illiterate Petitioners.

MR. A. L. STANLEY (Cheshire, Eddisbury): I beg to ask the Chairman of the Public Petitions Committee if he can state the proportion of illiterate signatures in petitions presented against the Education Bill.

---

† See Col. 919.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (Yorkshire, W. R., Holmfirth): I cannot give the information, which could only be obtained after an exhaustive search.

Shrewsbury Municipal Charities.

MR. BILLSON (Staffordshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for East Bristol, as representing the Charity Commissioners, why the proposed scheme for administering the municipal charities of the borough of Shrewsbury has not yet been carried into effect.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): Numerous objections and suggestions received by the Commissioners up to the 12th May last upon the publication of the draft scheme have now been considered and the Order establishing the scheme will be made almost immediately.

Irish Convicts—Petitions for Release.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether petitions for the release of a prisoner are filed or reconsidered at stated intervals; and, if so, whether a petition recently dealt with in the case of James M'Cann, of county Longford, will be again taken into consideration by the law officers of the Crown.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange): All memorials for the release of a prisoner are filed. The cases of all convicts undergoing long sentences are periodically submitted for consideration in accordance with the regulations. James M'Cann's sentence being one of three years penal servitude only there is no rule under which his case would be reconsidered. It is, of course, optional with the convict or any one on his behalf to forward a memorial at any time, and such memorial will be laid before the Lord-Lieutenant for his decision. It is not a matter with which the law officers of the Crown can properly interfere.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): By whom are the memorials considered—by the law officers of the Crown?

MR. CHERRY: No. They are considered by the Lord-Lieutenant himself.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does not the Lord-Lieutenant act on legal advice?

MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: Was it not the Lords Justices who refused the prayer of the petition in this case?

MR. CHERRY was understood to say that in the absence of the Lord-Lieutenant for Ireland the Lords Justices might consider such matters, but the law officers of the Crown never intervened in such cases. He knew nothing of the case.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: It was by your direction the man was prosecuted.

MR. CHERRY: After a conviction a case passes entirely out of the domain of the law officers.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does the Lord-Lieutenant personally consider these cases?

MR. SPEAKER: Notice had better be given of that.

Irish Magistrates.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the practice at present prevailing of magistrates adjudicating in cases in which they have a personal interest, and also in sanctioning as advocates their friends and relations to appear before them; and, in view of the tendency to corruption under these circumstances, will he deal with the matter by legislation or otherwise.

MR. CHERRY: I am not aware of the practice prevailing in Ireland of magistrates adjudicating in cases in which they have a personal interest. It is quite contrary to law that they should do so; and if the hon. Member is aware of any particular case in which a magistrate has so acted, he ought to bring the matter under the notice of the Lord Chancellor. As regards the second part of the Question, magistrates have no power to refuse to hear advocates, whether solicitors or barristers, who appear before them on the ground merely that they are either friends or relations of their own, and I fear it would be a very dangerous power to put into their hands. If in any case a magistrate uses undue means to procure the employment of a relative in a case pending before him, or shows partiality towards the litigant who so employs a friend or relation, the conduct of such magistrate should be brought to the attention of the Lord Chancellor, who will, I feel sure, if the charge is clearly established, deal with it with the utmost severity.

Sir Antony MacDonnell.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland does the position which Sir Antony MacDonnell occupied under the late Government still subsist, and will he state what precisely that gentleman's position is as regards salary, emoluments, duties, powers, and tenure of office.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): Sir Antony MacDonnell is still Under-Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. His salary and emoluments are stated in the Estimates for the Civil Service, Class II., page 200, for the present financial year. His duties and powers are in part prescribed by statute, and in part not so prescribed; and his tenure of office is the same as that of other permanent Civil servants.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Is it part of his duty to appoint Land Sub-Commissioners?

MR. BRYCE: That does not arise out of the Question.

The Royal Canal.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland have the Board of Control of the Royal Canal yet succeeded in ascertaining what their powers and duties are; do the powers enable them to oblige the Midland Railway Company to compensate boatmen at present out of employment in consequence of that company's neglect; will the company be allowed to prolong this period of enforced idleness beyond the present month; and what explanation do the Board of Control give of the fact that although the canal is overgrown with weeds and bushes, the season most suitable for clearing it, and no traffic to interfere with that work, no such work is being done.

MR. BRYCE: The Irish Government have been in communication with the Board of Control of the Royal Canal, and it has been decided to be necessary to raise the number of the Board to its statutory complement of five. Steps to this end are under the consideration of the Lord-Lieutenent. The reply to the second inquiry of the Question is in the negative. It will not, I am informed, be necessary to keep the Spencer Dock closed to traffic after the end of the present month, as the work of repair will be completed by that time. I am informed by the Board of Control that the canal is not overgrown with weeds and bushes. Traffic is now proceeding on the canal, and the work of removing such weeds and bushes as exist in it is being carried out.

MR. GINNELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware there are four gates across the towing path? His Answer is not correct.

MR. BRYCE: I believe my information is perfectly correct. We wish to make the canal available for traffic as soon as possible.

Judicial Land Commissioner.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is in a position to give the name of the gentleman whom it is now proposed to appoint as Judicial Land Commissioner; if not, will he give an assurance that it shall not be any one of the judges of the High Court or any other man who has been a political or class partisan; and will the appointment be made before the summer adjournment of Parliament.

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware of a vacancy, present or impending, in the office of Judicial Land Commissioner.

MR. GINNELL: Is not the right hon. Gentleman ashamed of the dishonest Answers he has read to-day?

*THE SPEAKER: That is a most improper Question. [Cries of "Withdraw."]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that some of the Irish Members at any rate do not sympathise with this attack upon him.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that three-fourths of the Irish Members do not sympathise with it.

American Bacon Imports.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received any reports on the increased and increasing quantity of American bacon imported into Ireland, and its quality; is there any inspection of this bacon on its importation; has any report been received by the Irish Government connecting the increase of tuberculosis with the consumption of American bacon; and has he any official information showing that numbers of pigs affected with tubercular disease are slaughtered in America, and the flesh sent to the United Kingdom as bacon.

MR. BRYCE: The information at the disposal of the Department of Agriculture shows that there was a considerable increase in the quantity of bacon imported into Ireland in 1905 as compared with 1904. Most of this bacon is American, and is cheaper than, and inferior in quality to, the bacon exported from Ireland. There is no inspection, as far as the Department are aware, of American bacon on importation. Under the Public Health Acts any sanitary officer has power to inspect any meat for sale, intended for the food of man, and to seize the same if it appears to him to be unfit for human food. The Department have received no report connecting the increase of tuberculosis with the consumption of American bacon; nor have they any information in regard to the statement contained in the last part of the Question.

Morley Estate, County Cavan.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that a tenant on the Morley Estate, county Cavan, named John Nixon, had his rent reduced by Lord Morley in 1882 from £46 a year to £34 10s., and paid at the reduced rent down to the sale of the estate by Lord Morley in 1898 to a syndicate; that the syndicate now claim rent at the rate of £46, and have compelled Nixon to pay up arrears at that rate, and are at present proceeding against him for rent at £46; that negotiations for the sale of the estate to the Estates Commissioners are pending; will the Estates Commissioners decline to purchase unless Nixon and other tenants are fairly dealt with; and has Nixon's rent been returned as a £46 rent in the rental furnished to the Commissioners, and are they aware that £34 10s. was the rent in fact paid for many years.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the townland in which John Nixon's holding is situate is not included in the Crookenden and Casey (late Morley) Estate, in respect of which proceedings for sale have been instituted before them. The Commissioners are not aware of the facts stated in the Question, and have no power to intervene in disputes between landlord and tenant as to rent. They will, however, enquire into the circumstances under which the townland in question has been excluded from the sale of the estate.

Sligo and Leitrim Evicted Tenants.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many applications have been received by the Estates Commissioners from evicted tenants in the counties of Sligo and Leitrim from the 1st November, 1903, to the present time; and how many of these cases have been dealt with by the Commissioners.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received 154 applications for reinstatement in county Leitrim, and ninety-two for reinstatement in county Sligo, and they have received information that reinstatement has been effected in twenty-four of the cases in county Leitrim and in one case in county Sligo. The Commissioners are having inquiries made into the cases of applicants from these counties as rapidly as possible.

Phibbs' Estate, Tubbercurry.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lietenant of Ireland, whether the Phibbs' estate, situated at Tubbercurry, county Sligo, and at present administered in the Land Judge's Court, has recently been offered for sale to the Irish Land Commission; and, if so, whether that portion of the estate situate in the town of Tubbercurry is included in such offer.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware that an attempt was made some time ago to sell that portion of the Phibbs' Estate, situate in the town of Tubbercurry, county Sligo, and at present in the Land Judge's Court, to a middleman named Dr. Brennan, of Charlestown, county Mayo, without any notice having been given to the tenants, who were and are willing to pay a liberal price for their houses; and whether, in case this purchase by Dr. Brennan has not taken place, he will communicate with the Land Judge and the Estates Commissioners with the view of ensuring that the tenants shall have due notice of any sale of the estate to be proposed hereafter, in order that they may have an opportunity of purchasing their town holdings.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have, with a view to purchase, issued a request under Section 7 in regard to part of the estate of R. H. Phibbs in the neighbourhood of Tubbercurry; but the town is not included in their proposed purchase, which relates to agricultural property only. The estate generally is for sale in the Land Judge's Court, and the Registrar of that Court informs me that Dr. Brennan, one of the tenants, has made a proposal to purchase for cash certain town plots in Tubbercurry, and this proposal will be brought before the learned Judge for his consideration when the necessary documents have been prepared. If the immediate tenants desire to have notice of the proceedings, they should enter an appearance in the case, when they would have an opportunity of submitting their views to the Court.

MR. O'DOWD: Do I understand that if the tenants put forward a scheme it will be favourably considered?

MR. BRYCE: I said they should have notice if they desired to do so.

Belfast Police Inquiry.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what were the facts and circumstances which, in his opinion, rendered the recent inquiry into the Belfast police system necessary; what has been the cost of that inquiry up to date; and did the Lord Mayor or High Sheriff of Belfast, the Commissioner of Police in Belfast, or any leading or representative person in or connected with that city ask for this inquiry.

MR. BRYCE: The Irish Government were led by several considerations, which could not be adequately set forth within the limits of an Answer, to the conclusion that a Commission of Inquiry into the organisation, discipline, and working of the Constabulary in Belfast was desirable. The circumstances which gave rise to the appointment of the Commission will best be shown by the report of the Commission when it appears. The cost of the inquiry has not yet been ascertained. Neither the Lord Mayor nor High Sheriff of Belfast asked for the inquiry.

Irish Labourers' Act Returns.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when the Returns as to the working of the Labourers' Act will be circulated, as hon. Members from Ireland are anxious to have them as soon as possible.

MR. BRYCE: The distribution of these Returns is not a matter for which I am responsible. I have, however, conveyed the hon. Member's wishes to the proper quarter, and am informed that the Returns will be ready for distribution on Monday next.

Bi-lingual Teaching.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): In view of the adoption of the new system for the remuneration of teachers can the Chief Secretary say what is proposed with regard to bi-lingual schools?

MR. BRYCE: A special grant of 4s. per scholar in average attendance will be made to schools taking the bi-lingual programme. The bi-lingual programme may be adopted in those cases only where the home language of the majority of the scholars is Irish.

Loans for Workmen's Houses in Ireland

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the importance of encouraging urban councils in Ireland to proceed with the building of workmen's houses, he will immediately authorise the granting of Irish loans for this purpose, at the lowest possible rate consistent with involving no loss to the Treasury; whether, on this basis, the present state of the market would permit him to grant loans at 3 per cent. interest per annum; and whether he will also agree to extend the period for repayment to sixty-eight years, being the terms granted in the Irish Land Act, 1903.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The Commissioners of Public Works are empowered to make loans to urban district councils in Ireland under the Housing of the Working Classes Acts. The rates of interest chargeable on such loans are the same as apply to all loans to local authorities out of the Local Loans Fund. These rates are fixed by the Treasury under statutory direction, so as to secure the solvency of the Local Loans Fund. It would not be possible, in the present state of the market, to reduce the rate of interest to 3 per cent. without loss to the Fund. The statutory maximum period for repayment of the loans is fifty years.

Agricultural Holdings Consolidation Bill.

MR. BECK (Cambridgeshire, Wisbech): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to give opportunities for the further progress of the Agricultural Holdings Consolidation Bill.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): I am afraid that I cannot say at the moment what opportunities will be given. The Agricultural Holdings Consolidation Bill and the Land Tenure Bill are to some extent bound up together, but I am not without hopes that a satisfactory arrangement may be made for the passage of both measures.

Sea Erosion.

*MR. BECKETT (Yorkshire, N.R., Whitby): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he will announce the names of the Royal Commission which will inquire into the reclamation of foreshores and sea erosion.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The announcement will be made in a very few days.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Will Ireland be represented on the Commission?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not sure; I will inquire.

Central Unemployed Committee.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the statement of the chairman of the Central Unemployed Committee for London that at the present moment they are living from hand to mouth, and some of their best attempts are only financially secure till September, and to his appeal to Parliament to take such action that before the adjournment in August they may be able to lay the foundation of their next winter's work; and whether, in view of these facts, he will reconsider his decision that it would be impracticable to legislate on the subject before the summer adjournment of the House, or, in the alternative, will take such other steps as may be necessary to carry the Committee over the period which must intervene before legislation can take effect.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir, I am aware of the statement of the Chairman of the Central Unemployed Committee for London to which my hon. friend calls my attention. My right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board will make a full statement of the intentions of His Majesty's Government on July 19th, when the Vote for the Local Government Board is taken.

Education Bill—Personnel of Commission.

MR. HICKS-BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when the personnel of the Commission to be appointed under the Education Bill will be announced.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I hope to make the announcement in the course of a few days. I cannot state the names to-day.

MR. HICKS-BEACH: Will it be before Clauses 8 and 9 are reached?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Oh, yes.

THE CLOSURING OF THE EDUCATION BILL.

MR. COX (Preston) asked the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the fact that the greater part of Clause 4 of the Education Bill, containing matter of immense public importance, was last night passed through Committee, under the operation of the guillotine, without any opportunity for discussion, and whether he would consider the desirability of dropping a large number of the remaining clauses of the Bill, so as to abbreviate the proceedings in Committee in order to allow time for the adequate discussion of Clause 4 on Report.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am afraid we cannot adopt that course. It does not commend itself to me as being practicable.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, in respect of the Bills of Exchange Act (1882) Amendment Bill: Mr. John Philipps; and had appointed in substitution Mr. Wedgwood Benn. CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1906–7.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £110,146, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1907, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Agriculture and other Industries and Technical Instruction for Ireland, and of the services administered by the Department, including sundry Grands in Aid."

MR. CONOR O'KELLY (Mayo, N.) said that the Vote which was now before the Committee raised what he thought he could safely describe as one of the most important and urgent questions with which Parliament, in its Irish relations, could deal. This question had been before the House for many years and in many forms. It had been discussed in the Speeches from the Throne, on the Estimates, on Resolutions, and by way of Bills, whilst the attention of many Governments had been forced to it as the fountain and origin of most of their embarrassments and difficulties in the worst of Irish administration. And he ventured to think that the present Irish Secretary would admit that he would be saved many anxious hours at the Irish Office, that his task in Ireland would be shorn of most of its difficulty, if there were no Connaught problem with which to deal. This problem of the West was the Irish land question in its most tense and aggravated form, and until a really serious and courageous attempt was made to find a solution no Irish Secretary could answer for peace and tranquility in Ireland. Connaught had been in the past the storm centre of many Irish agitations; it was to that province that almost all measures of reform for Ireland, notably the Land Act of 1903, traced their origin. It was the people of the West, by their sacrifices and labours, that won that measure, that compelled the late Government to open anew the whole question of Irish land with a view to a settlement that would be lasting, and that would relieve the country of all those evils in which agrarian unrest was so abundantly prolific. It was the urgent need of putting an end to the unhappy conditions of life in Connaught that was urged as the chief reason why the Bill of 1903 should pass, and it was the most valuable recommendation of that measure to the support of all Parties at the time. Indeed, it was very questionable if that Bill would not have had a different fate if it had been then known that it would do but little to mitigate, let alone to remove, the burdens that pressed upon the people of the West. It was the cry of the people of the West that evoked the response of the Act of 1903, but in truth it must be now said that a great advance upon that measure must be made if one of the darkest blots on the social life of 1,000,000 of the population was to be removed, and if the people of this country were to put an end to conditions which remained an abiding reproach to their administration in Ireland. Connaught was responsible for the Act of 1903, but Connuaght, that deserved most, had derived least from it. As a remedy for congestion the Act of 1903 was a failure. When it passed this House the people were led to believe that it covered all the difficulties of the question, and that, through its operations, the evils of congestion would speedily disappear. Not unnaturally the hopes of the people ran high. The Act had been in operation for a considerable time, and those hopes had not been fulfilled, nor could they see any evidence of any immediate prospect of their being so; the expectations which the Act aroused had not been realised, and to-day in every county in Ireland where this question was acute there was profound and widespread disappointment, and the people asked Parliament again to intervene. Who or what was responsible for the breakdown of the Act in the congested counties? The shortcomings of the Act, its imperfections, made it all too easy for the Irish landlords, where they chose, to obstruct and to wreck its working. Some of them had refused to sell at all either tenanted or untenanted land; some of them had agreed to sell only the occupied land, that was those areas of sterile soil in which were included what the Member for Dover, perhaps not in the most felicitous language, described as the "agricultural slums" of Connaught, reserving the untenanted portions without which sales in the congested areas would be worse than useless; and some of them were demanding terms so ridiculously extravagant as to make purchase impossible. Others had been at pains to discover means by which when they did decide to sell the result would not have the most infinitesimal effect on the problem of congestion, and he should like particularly to direct the special attention of the Chief Secretary to this latest development of landlord policy in Connaught. It would give the Committee some idea of the kind of co-operation that was to be expected from some Irish landlords in making the Act a measure of relief to the small cottiers in the congested counties. These landlords, instead of selling their property as a whole to the Congested Districts Board—the occupied portions, the congested holdings, and the grass ranches—for improvement purposes, for enlarging and amalgamating old holdings and making them economic, and for creating new ones, as Parliament intended, proposed to proceed quite differently. They proposed to divide the grass lands into so many separate new holdings, and then to sell them by auction to the highest bidders. In this way ten or twelve years purchase, in the shape of fines, would be secured, tenancies would be created, and then the landlord would sell under the Act of 1903 at twenty-three or twenty-four years purchase, an additional three or four years purchase being added from the bonuses available when the transaction was completed. In all, this brilliant device would result to the landlord in thirty-five or forty years purchase for his property. But one might ask where would the small tenants on the congested parts of the property come in under this arrangement? They could not afford to pay fines—it was their poverty that led Parliament to pass the Act of 1903, they were the men it was intended to reach—and the consequence would be that the land would pass into the hands of men who could afford to pay fines; but it was not for those men that the Act of 1903 was passed through this House. This specious device of still further landlord exaction was attempted in Mayo, but it did not succeed. Public opinion would not stand it, and for a time, at any rate, the project had been abandoned. But, of course, no one could tell when it might be revived. It was bad enough that ten or twelve years purchase should be added to prices already extravagantly high—time would show whether these prices would not have ruinous results—but had this new plan of disposing of the grass lands succeeded, then congestion in the West would have remained with them for all time. For what would have inevitably happened was this. The landlords whose method of sale brought thirty-five or forty years purchase would soon find hosts of imitators, and auction would speedily follow auction on every estate in Connaught. The land needed to rescue the submerged thousands of the congested areas would pass into the hands of men for whom it was not intended, over 1,000,000 acres in the province would be filched from the people, and the Congested Districts Board, unable to stir a hand or move a foot whilst this process of defeating the intentions of Parliament was going on, might as well pull down its blinds and put up its shutters, for the days of its usefulness would be at an end. When the Act of 1903 was in Committee an Amendment was moved from the Nationalist benches that would have met this particular kind of case, but, like all other Amendments dealing with congestion, the Pre-emption Amendment had to be withdrawn after they had gone through the solemn farce of a discussion that no one took seriously and nobody believed to be real. There was only one remedy for this state of things. That remedy had been urged over and over again by the Irish Party, and by everyone who knew anything about the requirements of the West. The Congested Districts Board must be given compulsory powers. Had Parliament not sufficient justification for that step in the attitude of the Irish land lords during the past few years; and he asked, was it worthy of Parliament to give its adhesion to a great policy and to shrink from adopting the means by which alone it could be carried out? Although they were moving a reduction of the Vote for the Congested Districts Board it must not be inferred that the Irish representatives were attaching all the blame for the present situation to that body. Nothing of the kind. Whilst many things were done by the Board to which they took the strongest possible exception, it would be unjust to hold them accountable for what might be described as the deadlock that had overtaken the work of putting the people on the land. They held that defects in legislation rather than in administration were accountable for the failure of the Land Act in the West. They recognised as much as anyone in this House the sympathy and zeal which the Board brought to their labours, and they were not less sensible of the splendid work done by some of their leading officials. But they held that, despite the best intentions, which they freely acknowledged, far greater power than was now possessed by the Board must be given to them if they were to accomplish the task for which they were appointed. The members of the Board had for many years shared this view, and he was sure it was unnecessary to remind the Chief Secretary of the resolution passed by the Board on this subject a few years ago. He was aware that the Board demanded compulsion, although the great majority of the members of that body were, he believed, strongly opposed to compulsion, except in the congested counties, where they were convinced it was the only solution of the existing difficulty. And he might remind the Chief Secretary that the right hon. Gentleman the present Leader of the Opposition, when the Act establishing the Board was before this House many years ago, made it clear that if the neccessity for compulsion was proved he would not be unwilling to grant it. According to the Board, the necessity for compulsion had been conclusively proved by the facts of their own experience, and what better authority on the subject could there be? If the Leader of the Opposition, in certain circumstances in the special case of the West, would approve this principle, he could not, for the life of him, see what great objection the Chief Secretary could have to it, especially when they remembered that the Party to which he belonged voted not long ago in favour of applying compulsion not merely in the exceptional case of Connaught, but to the four provinces in Ireland. The voluntary principle had had a fair chance, and it had failed. As the landlords could not be relied upon to facilitate the work of the Board—they did not appear to be greatly moved by the daily thinning of the population of Ireland that was going on—and as this House had decided that congestion, with all its evil consequences, must be removed, there was only one course open to the Government which offered any hope of success, and that was the adoption of the compulsory principle. That was their first demand. He now passed from that question to another of very great importance. They asked that all the Connaught counties should be scheduled as congested. The Irish Party had always insisted, and they now insisted, that the counties should be scheduled as a whole, and he did not think there would be very much difficulty in convincing the Committee of the soundness and the reasonableness of their view. It seemed an extraordinary thing that the system of scheduling districts as congested, which everyone admitted to be absurd and misleading as a test of congestion, should have survived the many Acts passed in this House since the Congested Districts Board was first established. He was, of course, aware of a slight modification of one of the Clauses of the Act of 1901, but that really did not touch the question. In the early days of the Board, when its work was largely tentative and experimental, when it was necessary to proceed with caution, and when the Board was not the really important body it had since become, it really did not much matter what plan of scheduling was adopted—any rough and ready classification of areas sufficed; but that stage had long since passed, and to-day, when the Board, with its increased income and its large credit, was able and was expected to carry out transactions on a really large scale, it ought not to be hampered by the operation of a rule that confined its work within narrow and arbitrarily selected areas. It should be free to apply itself to congestion wherever it existed, but this it could do until the present definition was abolished. A district electoral division did not answer to the prescribed definition of a congested area unless the valuation per head of the population was under 30s. In the county of Mayo almost every single electoral division would come under the 30s. limit if the valuation was determined on the actual holdings of the people, a course that would seem fair and reasonable, but the Board must add the valuation of the great grazing ranches of thousands of acres with a population of half a dozen herds, with the result that the per head valuation was artificially raised far above the 30s. standard. The system excluded fifty electoral districts, nearly half of the total number, in the county of Mayo, and to his own knowledge they were all as deplorably congested as—many of them more congested than—the areas that were scheduled. Let him give one instance to show how the system worked. In the Claremorris Union there were nineteen electoral divisions, of which eight were unscheduled. In one of these electoral divisions, Crossboyne, there were 3,437 acres, of which 2,000 acres were grazing land with a population of, say, a dozen herds. The balance, 1,400 acres, represented small holdings with a population of 675 people. The grazing valuation was £1,189, and the occupying valuation £884. The per head valuation including the grazing land worked out at £3 17s.; excluding the grazing land it dropped to £1 6s., well under the figure at which it would be entitled to be scheduled. He should like if some one would explain why it was not on the valuation of the actual holdings of the people that the calculation was made. But to show how utterly fallacious this system was as a test of the conditions of the people in the electoral division of Crossboyne, where the £3 17s. per head valuation would suggest some degree of prosperity, out of 137 holdings no fewer than 110 were congested and uneconomic, and in the eight unscheduled divisions of the Claremorris Union, no less than 1,114 holdings were uneconomic. In Ballina 42 per cent. of all the occupiers were excluded, in Castlebar 53 per cent., in Killala 70 per cent., and in Ballinrobe 77 per cent. As he did not desire to weary the Committee with these figures he would have done with them when he said that in the county of Mayo alone nearly half of the electoral divisions of the county, with 9,000 small occupiers representing roughly 45,000 people, were excluded by a provision for which no one could advance a serious excuse. There was no use in saying that because rescheduling would involve a recasting of the financial basis of former measures the work should not be done. Why should this unjust discrimination between the same class of small occupiers continue? Let him point out to the Committee the injustice that resulted from it. Under the Act of 1901 the Board could purchase land in unscheduled districts, but only for the benefit of the people in the scheduled districts. He had in his mind the case of a large grazing tract purchased by the Board in a non-scheduled district. Although not scheduled for a similar cause to that which he had just stated, it contained many small and uneconomic holdings. The local people not unnaturally thought that this land, which was practically at their doors, would be used to increase their small holdings. But the land was to be used by the Board for migration schemes and they would be shut out. When the land was thus disposed of they would find their congestion stereotyped, and all hope of improvement cut off. In this way the Board, while curing congestion on one property, were making it chronic on another. While this method of procedure was not businesslike or just it had also its serious side. Could it be expected that the old tenants would welcome the newcomers with open arms? No; smarting under a sense of wrong, they keenly resented their presence, and good relations between them were scarcely possible; indeed, if public opinion were stirred upon the subject these migration schemes would not be possible, the Board would not be able to carry them out. But, after all, these difficulties could be got over. Let the counties be scheduled as a whole, leaving the Board free to deal with congestion whenever it found it; let the Board get power to acquire all the land it needed and these troubles would be avoided, for there would be ample to meet the requirements of all. There were many other matters he would like to deal with, but as he had already rather heavily taxed the patience of the Committee he would let them pass. When they reflected on the obstacles that obstructed the work of curing congestion, the attitude of the landlords, their extravagant demands, their objection to parting with untenanted land in some cases, and in other cases their selling it by public auction or private treaty; when they considered the defective character of the legislation under which the Board was working, its limited powers, its general inequipment for the great task imposed upon it, the heartbreaking delays that attended its operations, the wrong lines upon which many of its schemes were proceeding, thus daily adding to the difficulties of an ultimate solution; when they remembered the thousands of occupiers excluded from any share in the results of it labours—he thought the time had come for a serious and exhaustive survey of the whole Western problem and a careful review of the Acts that related to it. In order that this might be done, they had a proposal to make to the Government; but let him say most emphatically that if they thought that this proposal would mean delaying legislation they would not dream for one moment of making it. When this proposal was first made, a few months ago, they knew then that there would be no legislation on the question this year, and it appeared to them that the interval between now and next session could not be better occupied than in a thorough inquiry into every phase and difficulty of this problem. So that when fresh legislation was attempted, as no doubt it would be next year, it would represent a clear understanding of what was required for a settlement that, unlike former "settlements," would be final. No doubt it might not be a popular thing to suggest a Royal Commission to inquire into an Irish question. Royal Commissions had a bad reputation in Ireland; they were regarded as an expedient to which all Governments had recourse for escaping difficulties and shelving questions. If they thought that that would be the result in this case, it was not likely that they would demand an inquiry. But this inquiry could not postpone any legislation this year, for, as they all knew before this proposal for a Commission was made, there was to be none. This inquiry could not prevent legislation next session because a Commission, if appointed, ought to have finished its task and issued its Report before Parliament met next year. Therefore, whatever else might be said of the proposal, it did not lie in the mouth of anyone to say that it could be used as an excuse for postponing legislation. The inquiry they asked for, proceeding on the lines of the Scottish Royal Commission on the Highlands and Islands, should not take more than four or five months. The Scottish Commissioners completed their task in five months, although the country in which they conducted their local inquiries had far less facilities for travelling than the province of Connaught and the congested counties outside that province. If such a Commission as they suggested got to work at once he saw no reason why its inquiries should not be concluded and its Report issued by the end of the year. This inquiry had been asked for by the representative bodies of the West; the Galway and Mayo County Councils had asked for it; so had all the district councils of the county of Mayo, and, he believed, of the county of Sligo; it had been asked for by executives and branches of the League throughout the province, and resolutions in its favour had been passed at many public demonstrations in Connaught during the last few months. They wanted this inquiry as a preliminary to serious legislation; they wanted it so that they might have a chance of proving that past Acts of Parliament really trifled with this great question; and that the case for a courageous and comprehensive measure might be made. When new legislation came they wanted it to err rather on the side of boldness of treatment than on the side of timidity of treatment, which had been the main defect of all Irish land legislation in the past. They wanted legislation that would oppose migration to emigration, that would at last impose some check on the frightful exodus of their people—the flower of the youth of their country—that was going on under their eyes, by throwing open the boundless plains of Connaught to re-settlement. They wanted it as a measure of social reconstruction in a ravaged province, a province that, after all, was not poor, that was capable of great things if only it got a chance. And in order that such legislation might be passed they asked the Committee by full and serious inquiry to familiarise themselves with every aspect of social life comprehended in the problem of the West. The right hon. Gentleman could not be unmoved by the sad spectacle of a land that might easily be prosperous becoming a derelict among the nations, abandoned by its own; and no higher and worthier task could engage his labours than that of stopping this tragic wasting of an already exhausted nation whilst there was yet time. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £110,046, be granted for the said Service.—(Mr. Conor O'Kelly.)

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.) said that, in supporting the Motion of his hon. friend, he would not detain the Committee for more than a few minutes. Indeed, it was unnecessary that he should do so, for no words of his could add to the force of the case which had been presented to the Committee. But representing as he did a Western constituency, he felt that perhaps he might be deemed wanting in his duty if he did not intervene with a few remarks. The question of congestion in the West and elsewhere concerned every Irish Member. More especially, however, did it concern the Members representing constituencies in Connaught, for in that province the evil effects of congestion were felt more keenly than elsewhere. There it constituted the kernel of what was known as the Western problem, on the speedy solution of which depended the peace, the prosperity, and the contentment of a whole province. It was impossible to deal with this question fully unless they dealt with the working of recent Land Purchase Acts, and on the effects which these Acts might have on the economic conditions prevailing in Connaught. This he did not propose to do at any length. But he would like to say, in passing, what he thought nobody who knew anything of this problem would deny, that it was this question of congestion which was mainly responsible for the passing of the Land Act of 1903—an Act which, no matter how it might have worked elsewhere, had been a dead failure in the West of Ireland. It could never be too often insisted that the land question in Connaught was entirely different from the land question outside it, and must have a special remedy. It could hardly be denied that the clauses of the Act of 1903 dealing with congestion had become inoperative and that new methods must be found. The defects of these clauses had been made abundantly plain, and until they were remedied all hope of serious dealing with the West disappeared. What was the remedy that would put beyond all doubt and conjecture the ending of congestion? It was, and it must be, compulsion. The landlord who let vast grazing tracts on the eleven months system could not be induced to give them up, and if they did not devise some scheme by which he would be compelled to give them up on being paid a liberal compensation, how could land be secured for the landless people? Let him draw a picture of what congestion really was and what the circumstances obtaining in Connaught were. In that province there were nearly a million of acres of grassland mostly held by non-residential graziers—some of the finest land to be found anywhere—whilst the masses of the people were grouped together on uneconomic patches of bogland reclaimed from its original state by the labours of their fathers. What was the effect of this state of things on the commercial, industrial, and agricultural interests of the West? Their towns were decaying because bullocks and sheep required no clothing. Neither did they require groceries. One herd with his dog was sufficient to take care of a ranche of 1,000 acres, which, divided into moderately-sized farms, would furnish employment for forty labourers and their families. They in the West had been taunted with not having built more labourers cottages. Their critics seemed to forget that they had no labourers. The farmer who would go in for cultivation was seriously handicapped because in most of the districts of Connaught there was no set agricultural labouring community such as there was to be found in the other provinces. The men on whom the farmers must rely for labour were the small farmers and cottars, and these as a rule went as migrating labourers to England and Scotland, whilst their sons and daughters, the bone and sinew of the land, emigrated, to the loss of Ireland, and if he were an Imperialist he would say to the loss of the British Empire as well. Goldsmith, the great Irish poet, a century and a half ago, wrote these lines—

> "Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
> Princes and lords may flourish and may fade,
> A breath can make them as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed, can never be supplied."

Well might he wail over the havoc wrought to his country by heartless landlordism, ruthless eviction, and British misgovernment. In Connaught they had 18,193 farms valued at £5 and under, whilst they had 12,000 migratory labourers who owned no land. Even in his own county of Sligo—and it was by no means the most congested county in Connaught—over 25 per cent. of the tenanted holdings were valued at £4 or under. In his own constituency of South Sligo he would be safe in saying that at least 40 per cent. of these holdings were valued at £4 or under. In two unscheduled divisions in the Union of Boyle, he found the gross poor law valuation to be £7,414, whilst the value of grass lands in these divisions amounted to £2,523 more than one-third of the whole. This was typical of the state of affairs in a county by no means the most congested. Connaught had been brought to this position by the confiscations, persecutions, and evictions of the past. Their population had gone down by one-half during the past half century. They wanted to save the remnant of their population. They wanted the land for the people. In the beginning of this, the twentieth century, they came once more to this House, the majority of whose Members represented, he was glad to say, the enlightened democratic thought of Great Britain, to plead the cause of fair play for the congested districts in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had introduced a Bill which would, he felt convinced, settle the question of the agricultural labourers in Ireland. He congratulated him most heartily on the courage he had displayed in introducing that Bill, which it was to be hoped would settle the question once and for all. Might he be permitted to hope that the right hon. Gentleman would go forward in the path of reform, and push onward a measure which would settle for ever the agrarian problem in the West—a measure which would be the means of creating a new set of peasant proprietors to replace the herds who now roamed over the fertile hills and valleys of Connaught—a measure which would be the means of creating an agricultural labouring community for Connaught, and a measure which would be the means of handing down to posterity, amid the prayers of the Irish people, the name of the right hon. Gentleman.

DR. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.) said it was due to the condition of things in the congested districts of Ireland that the land agitation was started which had paved the way to the abolition of landlordism. The so-called farmer in a congested district was in a far worse condition than any other person in Ireland, because his holding, a mere patch of land, was generally of the worst character, and could not possibly support the burdens which were placed upon him. He therefore generally became a migatory labourer in England and in Scotland, and in the intervals between his migration devoted his time to reclaiming his holding. Yet up to the present little had been done to remedy the conditions of these farmers. A Board, it was true, had been established for that purpose, but at the rate at which the Congested Districts Board was dividing up the grazing lands among the farmers of the congested districts he was afraid nobody would be left to take the land when it came to hand. Leaving out of consideration the question of compulsory purchase, the only remedy he could see for this state of things was to put upon the Board men who were conversant with the conditions of the congested districts. Many serious allegations had been made in his constituency that instead of trying to relieve congestion the Congested Districts Board were acting the part of a large emigration agent. He had asked for and obtained a Return of the land purchased and sold by the Congested Districts Board in the county of Mayo during the ten years ended March 31st, 1906. He found that nearly 2,000 acres had been in the hands of the Congested Districts Board for six, seven, and eight years for grazing purposes. It was said that the tenants had refused to buy land, but if business men had been on the Board they would have themselves made inquiries into the reason of this refusal instead of leaving it to officials. When he was in Ireland at Easter he saw lots of young fellows at the railway station starting for America, and if the Congested Districts Board put agents at the railway stations they would find any number of young men who would willingly take up this land. Out of over 270,000 acres purchased by the Board only about a half had been sold to tenants, and of the half that had not been sold over 60,000 acres had not been vested in the Board. He wanted to know the meaning of the words "not vested." Was it for the want of proving title ? If so, surely there should be some limit. If the landlord did not prove his title within three or six months the law should step in and take the right out of the landlord's hands. He found that amongst the holdings that had been kept in the hands of the Board for seven years were three estates in the parish of Newport in the Westport Union—he referred to portions of the O'Donel, the Stoney, and the Jones Estates, and the reply that he received to a Question the other day was that their lands were being held over until the Board could buy the fee simple of the O'Donel Estate at Newport. In the case of three townlands with fifty families in all, the average rent per family was £2 2s., some being as low as 10s. In fact, there were over 600 agricultural tenants in the parish of Newport the valuation of which did not average £3 a tenant, and yet there were 30,000 acres of grass lands in the same parish owned by about fifteen persons. He had been trying as long as he had been a Member of this House to get the Congested Districts Board to buy this land, but owing to the fact that they had no compulsory purchase powers the landlords would not sell. It was the duty of the members of the Board themselves to inspect estates, and also to see the young men who were to be put upon the holdings. On May 3rd he asked a Question as to whether any members of the Board ever inspected estates that were about to be purchased, and whether they ever saw the intending occupiers with a view to their fitness for those holdings. The reply he got was that it was not the practice of the Board to interview intending occupiers of new holdings. † That reminded him of the story about Jay Gould, the famous New York millionaire, who, it was said, by touching a button could control the whole of the American railways. It seemed that the Congested Districts Board thought they could, by a similar method, tell who was fit and who was unfit for a new holding, and whether an estate was worth purchasing or not, and so forth. One of the chief causes, excluding the lack of compulsory purchase powers, of the non-successful working of the Congested Districts Board was that of inefficiency. He appealed to the Chief Secretary to insist that Judge Ross should sell out the O'Donel Estate. It was said in the Newport parish that the Congested Districts Board had bought out a lot of small tenants at such exorbitant prices that they had been tempted to go to America. He had a list of at least twenty families who had been bought out since the Board came into possession of the land. As this was a serious statement to make against the Board's officials, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would grant a sworn inquiry into the charge that the Board, instead of endeavouring to keep the people at home by dividing the land amongst them, induced them to go to America by giving extravagant prices for their holdings. He wanted to know what had become of these little holdings that had been bought out. Would the right hon. Gentleman make a serious and honest attempt to find out the cause of the delay in the sale by Judge Ross of the O'Donel Estate, and having found out the cause, would he apply a speedy and effective remedy ? Would the right hon. Gentleman also appoint practical men on the Board, men who understood the problem of congestion, namely, those from congested district committees.

Dr. Ambrose.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.) supported the suggestion of appointing a Royal Commission to inquire into the failure of the Congested Districts Board to deal with the question as it affected the West of Ireland. When the Land Act of 1903 was passing through Parliament it was admitted by all Parties that a settlement of the Irish land question was not possible unless the problem of Western Ireland was settled. The real difficulty of the whole question lay in that portion of the country, and, as far as a settlement there was concerned, the Act had proved a failure. Their wish now was to put on record the reason of that failure. When the Act was passing through the House of Commons there were two Amendments proposed from the Irish Benches; one was that compulsion should be applied in respect of all the untenanted land and congested properties; failing that, it was proposed that preemption should be given in respect of any untenanted land coming into the market. The Chief Secretary said that neither Amendment was necessary, as the inducements contained in the Bill were more than sufficient to bring all the land that was necessary into the market. But those inducements had not proved sufficient, and there existed throughout Connaught a regular conspiracy amongst the landlords and graziers either to prevent the land from coming into the market or to raise the price to such an extent as to make a settlement at the price almost as bad as the present state of affairs. They did not find fault with the Congested Districts Board, which so far as it was doing any work at all was doing it well. What he complained of was that the Board did not do sufficient work. It bought and sold estates exactly as he liked to see it done, but he wished the Board to be placed in a position to purchase all the untenanted land throughout the province. They wanted this work expedited, or else there was no hope for the people. He had heard the Chief Secretary declare how greatly affected he was in passing through a railway station in County Roscommon where he witnessed one of those scenes where friend was parting from friend for ever upon departing for America. That kind of thing was going on as much as and probably more to-day than it was in those days. In the county which he represented, the population had been reduced from 300,000 to 100,000, and yet in that county there were 100,000 acres of untenanted land, enough to provide a good living for more than half the whole population that existed there sixty years ago. Instead of having 100,000 acres with nothing but beasts roaming over it, there ought to be cutlivating that land the people who were now ekeing out a most miserable existence in the bogs. It was from some of these estates that the agrarian trouble in Ireland arose. Hon. Members had heard of the De Freyne Estate. That estate had now been purchased by the Congested Districts Board, but owing to the slow operation of the law the tenants had received very little benefit from it. He believed the desire of the Board was to hurry on the work, but all these delays about title and other things could easily be remedied by an alteration in the law. The Board were now the representatives of Lord De Freyne, and they were acting in his name until he was able to clear the title of the estate, which often meant going back for centuries tracing family history. When purchasing these estates the Congested Districts Board bought all the arrears. Some of the people found it very hard to pay those arrears, but the Board claimed a year's rent every year, which would be quite reasonable if only the rent was reasonable. Some of the tenants were quite unable to pay this rent, and then proceedings were taken against them. The Board was satisfied to get a year's rent within twelve months, but when it took proceedings it pressed for the whole rent due, which in many cases amounted to three, four, five or six years rent, and frequently decrees were granted against the tenants with costs. But, after all, the Board was still satisfied to take a year's rent together with the cost of the whole proceedings. He would suggest that the Chief Secretary should have these cases examined and reported upon before proceedings were taken, and then they would discover what was the condition of the particular individuals before they were sued. Some of them were not able to pay at all, and seeing that the Board were sometimes satisfied with one year's rent, surely an arrangement might be made by which they would only proceed for one year's rent, because the effect of proceeding for the whole amount greatly increased the costs. He had heard of cases in which the costs amounted almost to the year's rent, owing to the fact that the whole amount of the arrears were sued for. He had no doubt that when the right hon. Gentleman brought these facts before the Congested Districts Board the matter would be dealt with in a satisfactory and sympathetic manner. There ought to be some alteration in connection with the administration of the Board itself, because nothing could be done without its authority, and it met very seldom. He asked a Question a short time ago about a large grazing farm in his own constituency from which a few years ago some tenants were evicted. Since then it had been in the hands of a grazier, but recently it came into the market. The small tenants round about were anxious that it should be purchased by a public authority, and they wrote to the Congested Districts Board, but the parish priest, Father O'Hara, received a reply to the effect that the Board could not buy the land because it was outside the scheduled district, and that the matter could not be further considered until July, when the Board met. He (Mr. Hayden) then wrote and was told that the land was suitable. The land had since been sold to a butcher living twenty miles away. Yesterday another large farm was put up for sale in Dublin, a farm in Roscommon which it was understood two years ago was being acquired. But they were told that a grazier in the neighbourhood had a tenancy of three-quarters of the farm, which would be confirmed to him. The tenants then said it was not worth troubling about. Questions were asked in this House on the subject, but all the information they got was that this grazier had a tenancy. The negotiations fell through between the Estates Commissioners or whatever the body was and the landlord. His information was that the Commissioners desired to make the grazier owner for ever of three-quarters of this large farm. The landlord, who wanted to realise the land for ready cash, put it up for auction yesterday in Dublin. The announcement of the auction described a certain portion of the land as held by a grazing tenant under a grazing lease which could be terminated any year on three months notice. So far as the Congested Districts Board or the Estates Commissioners were concerned no real effort was made, as far as he had been able to ascertain, to obtain this land for the people, and it was left to Mr. Fitzgibbon, the chairman of the county council of Roscommon, and to the parish priest of the district, to go to Dublin at their own expense, and at great inconvenience, to do the work which some public body or paid official should have done. It was questionable as a matter of policy whether the Congested Districts Board ought to be represented at auctions at all, but still when land was for sale some effort ought to be made privately or publicly by one of these public bodies to get it for the people. In this case the land was purchased yesterday on behalf of the tenants by Mr. Fitzgibbon for £1,000 less than the amount at which it had formerly been offered by the landlord. He could not explain why the landlord let it go for £1,000 less than the public body might have given, unless it was that the negotiations fell through owing to the presence of this grazing tenant, or, as had been suggested, that he required ready cash down, and that neither the Congested Districts Board nor the Estates Commissioners were in a position to pay him cash for at least twelve months. If the Congested Districts Board had no ready money to deal with such urgent cases he thought the Chief Secretary should make some regulation by which it would have money on credit to enable it at once to plank down the money to any grazier or landlord who was willing to dispose of his land. Even with the present powers the work of the Congested Districts Board could be greatly expedited. The purpose was to unite the people with the land and to do it as quickly as possible, and that could not be done with the small staff now available. Nor could it be done until compulsory powers were conferred on the Congested Districts Board. There would be huge disappointment in the West of Ireland, and in the Irish Party, if in the earlier days of next session the right hon. Gentleman was not prepared to produce a Bill which would at once settle this question for ever on the right lines. If the inquiry suggested by the hon. Member for North Mayo were carried out, it would enable the right hon. Gentleman to lay his hands at once on the spot, and to see the real cause of the past failure to effect the needed reforms. It was not necessary to inquire into the condition of the west of Ireland, or whether a remedy was required for the state of things prevailing there. The condition was known, and that there was a grievance all parties admitted. The existing state of things was a standing menace to the peace of the country. The remedy was to capture the large untenanted grazing ranches as quickly as possible, divide them up, and plant the people there. If the people once got a chance on the land from which their fathers and grandfathers had been driven there was not the slightest doubt that they would be amongst the most hard working and prosperous in the country. It was sometimes said that the Irish were idle and thriftless. Let the people who said so follow the poor fellows to the harvest fields of England and Scotland and watch how hard they worked, sometimes for eighteen or nineteen hours a day, in order that they might bring home the few pounds which were necessary to pay the rent of their little holdings and keep their families until harvest work came round again in this country. It was a slander to say that these most industrious people were idle and thriftless.

*MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.) called attention to the small attendance of Unionist Members during this debate, and asked whether that was to be taken as evidence of the amount of interest taken by English Members in Irish affairs. Throughout the debate they had been represented by a single ex-Cabinet Minister and about four lesser luminaries. When the Congested Districts Board was established, hopes were entertained in Ireland that in the course of a few years most of the grazing lands would be bought up in order to provide the means of subsistence for the occupiers of the miserable holdings on the bogs and moorlands, but those hopes had been disappointed. Like every board that had its root in Dublin Castle the Congested Districts Board had been a miserable failure. There were hundreds of people in his own constituency living on miserable bog holdings in houses of two rooms, and sometimes only one room. Side by side with these bog holdings there were vast tracts of grazing lands, but during the past fifteen years not a penny had been spent by the Congested Districts Board to purchase these lands and distribute them among the poor farmers. It was true that in his constituency the Congested Districts Board had advanced a sum of money to finance the parish committees and for the making of roads. Of course, these things were laudable in themselves, but the Board was making no effort to strike at the root of the evil there. He did not blame the members of the Board who were responsible for its administration. He blamed the constitution of the Board, and he blamed the British Treasury. Most of all he blamed the British nation which controlled the Treasury. It was a disgrace to the British nation, which received every year from Ireland in taxes £3,500,000 in excess of what was due from her, that they would not give a larger sum than £240,000 to solve the most acute and grievous social problem in the country. The people of England could spend £250,000,000 on an unnecessary war, but he supposed the representatives of the people thought it was better to spend that money in slaughtering Boers than in undoing, in so far as they could the wrongs which the nation had inflicted on Ireland. The Congested Districts Board had not adequate powers for dealing with the question of congestion. Until the Board had compulsory powers to purchase land at a fair price and to resell it to the tenants it could not possibly deal with the question. There was nothing harsh in asking people to part with land at a fair price when they were left with more than enough for their own purposes. Surely land was as necessary to the subsistence of the people as air and sunshine. It was quite as criminal and sinful to deprive people of the land which was necessary for their subsistence as it would be to deprive them of air and sunshine. To his mind the gravest defect in the Congested Districts Board was its constitution; it was not selected from the representatives of the Irish people. Until the whole country was represented on the Board no advantage would be gained, because the need of each particular district would not be brought before the Congested Districts Board, which was an organic part of the system of administration in Ireland, known as Castle Government. His trust was in the spirit of the people of Ireland. The Irish nation was still a young nation, but as it grew older it would grow stronger, and its power of helping itself would grow. He maintained that they would never have a satisfactory settlement of this question until they had a complete system of home administration.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.) wished to direct the attention of the Chief Secretary to a few matters affecting particularly the parts of the West of Ireland for which the Congested Districts Board was responsible—matters which affected the peace, happiness, and comfort of the people whose interests he represented. His experience was that the working of the Board after purchasing some properties in Loughrea district had been so slow and dilatory in allocating land to the poor cottiers for whom it was intended that the impression had got on the minds of the people that it was intentional to keep the country in a state of disquiet and disturbance. He instanced the case of the Benmore Estate. Quite recently more of it had been disposed of to the tenants, but for a length of time the delay had been the cause of great commotion and disturbance in the West of Ireland. It was only within the past few weeks that the matter had been satisfactorily arranged, and he did not wish to rake up old sores. But the lesson to be drawn from the purchase of Benmore Estate by the Congested Districts Board was that the Board should not enter into negotiations for the purchase of any estate in future without first consulting the tenants and finding out from them what price they were willing to give. The tenants on Benmore Estate were actually in negotiation with the landlord for the purchase of their holdings when the estate, including the untenanted lands as well as the holdings of the agricultural tenants, was purchased over their heads by the Board. That was an act of great imprudence and unwisdom which he hoped would not be repeated. However, "all's well that ends well"; and he was glad to say that perfect peace now reigned all over the district. There was a small property, Ballyfindon, on the De Freyne Estate, on which for the purchase of their agricultural holdings the tenants were in negotiation with Mr. Flannagan, the agent of Lord De Freyne, three years ago. Negotiations went on and everything in connection with the sale was practically settled. All that was needed was to sign the agreement and send it on to Dublin. But the first intimation that the tenants had in reference to other negotiations with Mr. Flannagan was an application from the Congested Districts Board for a year's rent. Part of the tenants' negotiations with Mr. Flannagan was that all the arrears of rent were to be wiped out with the exception of a small portion which was to be added to the purchase money. The tenants consulted him on the matter but did not take his advice; and he understood that they were now in the same or worse position than they were three years ago, when the Congested Districts Board bought the estate over their heads. Then there was the case of the Goodbody Estate, which was sold in the first instance to the Congested Districts Board. That estate consisted of 1,100 acres of land, but instead of devoting it to the relief of the congestion in the neighbourhood, the Board sold 500 acres of the fattest of the land to the Agricultural Board for the purposes of the Department; and the Estates Commissioners, having acquired possession of the balance of the land, including 20 acres of woodlands, sold 300 acres of it to the landlady of the neighbouring town of Athenry at a time when the unfortunate cottiers round about were asking for land for small holdings. Was that business? Then, in a congested parish at one end of South Galway—Mount Shannon—were to be found fifty families whose average valuation did not exceed £5. He had furnished the particulars to the painstaking secretary of the Board. Lying along side of these poor people were large ranches of beautiful land with virgin soil belonging to a Mr. Wakely, and this gentleman, evidently in a desire to destroy and evade the beneficent intentions of the Act as far as it related to congested districts, was selling out whole blocks of this grazing land to men, graziers and others, who already had an abundance of land. He asked the Chief Secretary to take a special note of this case and to make a strong representation to the Estates Commissioners to investigate closely the circumstances attending these sales, and on no account to leave these unfortunate holders of small patches of land to face the future with dejected and broken hearts. He thought that steps ought to be taken to secure the grazing land around Mount Shannon for the inhabitants of the place who were living upon small holdings. If the right hon. Gentleman did not see his way to do that he would go down there and make it very warm for those people who were trying to oust from these lands the poor people who lived in the district. Nobody could say that in doing that he would be committing any crime, and he was prepared to take the consequences of his action. He apologised for having taken up so much of the time of the Committee, having regard to the very natural and laudable desire felt by so many of his colleagues to deal with matters local to themselves. He would conclude by impressing upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary the necessity of not modelling his action upon that of his predecessors in office, namely, listening to their complaints and letting them in at one ear and out of the other.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.) thought that the case which had been made showed very clearly that after several years there still remained a condition of things in regard to the land question, especially in these congested districts, which did not redound to the credit of the English Government and which claimed the attention of the Chief Secretary and the Administration. He wished to deal with the congestion in the part of the county of Kerry which he represented. The poverty in Kerry was intense among the people living in the bogs and on the mountains, and the problem was complicated by the fact that, unlike Connaught where there were miles of rich and fruitful soil, there was very little untenanted land available for distribution among the people in order to relieve the congestion. The land which had been sold to the Congested Districts Board had not been very large in amount, but still in the limited sphere of their operations the Board had given satisfaction. He did not think the Committee realised the condition of poverty which prevailed among the people, and which must continue unless the Irish Government intervened on their behalf. The poverty, squalor, and misery which prevailed was quite under-rated. The population of the south and west of Ireland, especially in the congested districts, was largely decreasing. Emigration was going on to a great extent because there was nothing in the country to induce the people to stay at home. In the whole of the congested districts of Ireland the population was 490,000, and of these Kerry had 80,000 or about one-sixth of the total. Kerry and county Cork, moreover, had about a fourth of the whole of the congested population in Ireland within their borders. He earnestly suggested to the Irish Government that the condition of the people in the congested districts south of the Shannon required attention. In Kerry the 80,000 people had to exist upon holdings the average value of which was £1 3s. per head, while in Killarney 7,600 people lived upon holdings the average value of which was 6s. 10d. per head. In his own parish there were 600 people living upon land the average valuation of which was 2s. 9d. per head. The condition of things which existed was a disgrace to the civilisation of our times. What were the people to do? If they were thrown entirely upon their own resources, their only chance was to send their sons and daughters away to the labour markets of the world. When, therefore, the children became of a suitable age they went away to endeavour to earn money to keep up the home. He thought it would be admitted that the housing of the people was one very important condition which had to be considered. Any person who had studied the social condition of any country must admit that where the conditions of housing were bad the nation as a whole suffered. In Donegal, Kerry, and Mayo in many cases from five to eleven persons lived in one room. Necessarily the most insanitary conditions prevailed. The young men in the districts, therefore, realising that they could do no good in Ireland, and the young women also feeling the same thing, emigrated to America. The proper housing of the labourers was essential; if they wished to make for the future happiness and prosperity of these people they must make their houses sanitary, healthy, bright, and cheerful. The next test he would take was the sad condition of the peasant at the present time, and the number of the people in the congested districts who were supported out of the rates. Donegal supported one in fifty of its population; Leitrim one in fifty-seven; Galway, one in fifty-two; Mayo, one in fifty-eight; Sligo, one in fifty-six; and Kerry, one in forty-five. Those figures showed that the condition of poverty was worse in Kerry than anywhere else, whilst they made abundantly clear that there existed a condition of very severe poverty throughout the country. Another test was that there were in the county of Kerry 6,400 holdings the total valuation of which was only £12,000, or an average valuation of £2 a holding. And upon those holdings 32,000 people were striving to live. These figures taken with the others proved conclusively that there existed a condition of things in Ireland which called for the immediate and urgent attention of the Chief Secretary, and he hoped when the right hon. Gentleman considered the urgency of the question he would include Kerry in the scope of his operations. He regretted that so little land in Kerry had been dealt with by the Congested Districts Board, because regard to whatever land had been sold in the Congested Districts Board and its officers had given the fullest and most ample satisfaction. He was sorry to say very little of the land in Kerry had been made available. The Irish Church body had a considerable estate in Kerry, and for three years he had endeavoured to get the land purchased by the Congested Districts Board, but the Irish Church body had done everything in its power to prevent the purchase. The chief agent of the Board had made a valuation of the estate, and, upon that, made his offer, but the offer had been spurned. What was to be done with a body of that kind? Were the people to wait for years before something was done for them? He trusted that before long such bodies, if they would not sell their estates voluntarily, would be compelled to part with them for the benefit of the people. With regard to other estates in his consitituency he had advised his constituents to make an offer to their landlords to purchase at a price to be fixed by the Congested Districts Boards. He could not understand why that should be considered unfair and unreasonable. The tenants did not expect to be more favourably treated than the landlords. The tenants had no more votes on the Board than the landlords, and ought only to pay the price which this impartial body said was the fair price. Up to now the landlords had been disposed to sell and he hoped they would continue to be so disposed. But he hoped that one of the results from the Committee which was about to be appointed would be that if a landlord unreasonably refused to sell to a tenant the Congested Districts Board should have power to acquire the land for the benefit of the tenant. With regard to the suggested Commission he hoped the Chief Secretary would understand from the cases he had endeavoured to submit that Kerry and the adjoining counties required special consideration. The conditions of Connaught and Cork and Kerry were entirely different, because, while there was plenty of land in Connaught to relieve the congestion, in Cork and Kerry there was not. But there were other ways in which the congestion could be relieved, and therefore he urged the right hon. Gentleman, in order that this question might be thoroughly discussed, ventilated and understood, to appoint men on the Commission who knew the South of Ireland well. The conditions were pitiable, and those who lived among the people there felt that something should be done before the Irish race was drained of its best blood.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said during the whole afternoon they had had a succession of Irish representatives rising to tell the Committee of the state of despair in which the people were. He confessed that after he had listened to the case of hon. Members opposite and heard their reports he was almost reduced to a state of despair himself. But he ventured to point out with regard to the Commission that there was already a Royal Commission sitting in Ireland and affording unbounded amusement to the people. No one knew why it had been appointed, but it was travelling through Ireland very pleasantly and was collecting the most amazing evidence that had ever been collected by a Royal Commission in the United Kingdom. Hon. Members opposite had asked for a Commission and he was prepared to support their request, but he should have thought that this House of Commons fresh from the constituencies, with a great Liberal majority, and knowing this question as they did, ought to be prepared to act and not to inquire. They would not see the end of that Commission in two years. Had they any guarantee that this Commission would move quicker than its predecessors? None whatever. He said, with all respect to hon. Members opposite, knowing as he did the terrible state of their constituencies and the urgent need for immediate and drastic remedies, it was a perilous enterprise upon which they were entering. Something had been said about the difficulties. The whole question was full of difficulties. This was not the first time the matter had been inquired into. They had had a dozen Commissions within the last few years. They knew the disease perfectly well. They knew the remedy, but they were thwarted in its application. The Land Conference recommended in 1903—

> "that counties wholly or partially under the operation of the Congested Districts Board or under districts of a similar character will require separate and exceptional treatment with a view to the better distribution of the population, and of the land, as well as for the acceleration and extension of these projects for migration and enlargement of holdings which the Congested Districts Board as at present constituted, and with its limited powers, has hitherto found it impossible to carry out on an adequate scale."

The Land Conference had the whole case before it. The landlords agreed with the tenants' representatives that that would have to be done. The remedy lay there. Let them see how the thing was faced in the Land Act. Let him be just to the right hon. Member for Dover: he did make an effort to deal with it. Here was the clause in the Land Act which was to deal with this question. It would show English Members how this House was thwarted and beaten in all its efforts to deal with the problem. A sub-section of Section 6 of the Land Act, 1903, said—

> "In the case of a congested estate as defined by this section, if the Land Commission certify to the Lord-Lieutenant that the purchase and re-sale of the estate are desirable in view of the wants and circumstances of the tenants thereon then the Land Commission may purchase the estate for a price to be agreed upon, and in such case the condition in this section as to the re-sale without prospect of loss may be relaxed to such an extent as the Lord-Lieutenant may determine."

That was rather involved to English Members. What did it mean? It meant that the Land Commissioners were authorised by that section to negotiate with these landlords to purchase their estates and even to give a price that would involve a loss. The clause left the House of Commons in that condition. But the Bill had to go to the House of Lords. When it came back the clause read in this way—

> "In the case of a congested estate as defined by this section if the Land Commission with the consent of the owner. . . ."

Those last were the magic words introduced in the House of Lords, and under that section not a congested estate had been bought. Why? It was perfectly plain. The Connaught landlords did not want to sell their estates to the Land Commission when they would only get the value of them. The estates would be inspected, their value would be tested, and they would only get a fair price. They preferred to haggle with these poor people, squatted on a few acres of bog with arrears hanging over their heads. They preferred to deal with them directly—a free bargain they called it. The words introduced into the section by the House of Lords absolutely destroyed the intention of the House of Commons. They did not want a Royal Commission to tell them that. They knew it. If the Estates Commissioners had been given the power which the House of Commons intended they should have, many a poor cottar tenant would be in a fair way to earning a comfortable living to-day. That was an example of how legislation had been thwarted. He had walked and driven over these districts. He commenced it twenty years ago, and he had visited them every year since. If any English

Member wanted his pulse to beat a little more quickly he strongly advised him to take a holiday during the recess in county Mayo or county Galway. Let him go to Lord Clanricarde's estate, whose only amusement now was to evict his tenants. If Members wanted to realise what the west of Ireland was let them go to county Galway or county Mayo, and it would not take a Royal Commission to convince them. He hoped hon. Gentlemen below the gangway opposite would get some guarantees about this Commission. These poor people could not afford to wait. Sir Horace Plunkett's Department could wait till the crack of doom for all that the Irish people cared. These people could not afford to wait; they were in imminent peril every day. He hoped his hon. friends would have a guarantee of a two-fold kind in regard to the Commission for which they were asking. He hoped they would have a time limit on the proceedings. What about the personnel of that Commission? They had one lesson already in the Commission which was now sitting. So far as this question was concerned the men in Ireland with knowledge of the subject long ago made up their minds, and they had not an open mind to give to any Commission. There was not a man in the whole of Ireland who had given his attention to this terrible problem whose mind was not closed, and who did not know that the remedy was quite clear. There must be a re-settlement of Connaught. That was what was wanted. If these men were shut out they must take men with no knowledge. Did they think those men coming fresh to the question would be able to report in six months so as to deal effectively with the problem? Those were the dangers and the difficulties he saw. After the famine tens of thousands of people were cleared off the land. Fifty years ago around Ballinasloe there were crowds of people where there was now absolute silence. Those who did not die or emigrate were driven on to the bogs—on to those miserable patches, which were called uneconomic holdings, or they were driven up the mountains where it was almost impossible to cultivate the land. It was very easy to do that because the Government of the day stood behind the evictors——

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): They stand behind Lord Clanricarde to-day.

*Mr. T. W. RUSSELL said the people could be cleared off in thousands then, but it is not so easy to put them back. If the Act of 1903 had been allowed fair play the Estates Commissioners would have done their best, and would have succeeded in doing a great deal to settle the problem. He confessed the Chief Secretary had almost driven him to despair upon this land question. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman had as kindly a heart and as kindly feelings towards these people as he himself had, but he was bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman's Answers to Questions rather sent him into a despairing mood. Yesterday he told them that nothing could be done on Lord Clanricarde's estate for the tenants where they were being sued for half a year's rent, and what happened? This was the cruel irony of the situation. Those who knew that estate were thankful for the era of peace it had enjoyed recently, but looking back ten or fifteen years they would recollect the state of things that existed at that time. The landlord held the whole peace of that province practically in his own hands. This landlord did not live in Ireland, and boasted that he had not been there for a number of years except on one occasion, and that was to attend his father's funeral. The case was so bad and hopeless that he was sure the proposal to grant a Royal Commission was only a counsel of despair. Unless they could guarantee that the Commission would act promptly and in time for legislation next session, and also that it should be composed of impartial persons and not Irish landlords, the latter end of these poor people on the mountain side would be worse than it was now. All the facts were known and everything was clear, and there was no difficulty about the matter which this House would not be glad to surmount. He believed if the Chief Secretary courageously introduced a Bill next session giving the Congested Districts Board the power of compulsory purchase and telling the other House of Parliament that they considered the comfort of the people was far more important than their land was to them—if the right hon. Gentleman would only take his courage in both hands, and face this problem, he thought the Liberal Party and a good deal of what was best in the Landlord Party would be found ready to support him.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) said they had had bitter experience in the past of Royal Commissions, and the delay which had ensued in consequence of them. They had an example in the Royal Commission established to inquire into the financial relations of Ireland and Great Britain, which, after a great number of years of exhaustive inquiry, reported, and absolutely nothing had been done in regard to its Report. The whole history of Ireland was strewn with Royal Commissions, and he thought the hon. Member for South Tyrone knew this sufficiently well clearly to understand that no Nationalist Member would be in favour of a Royal Commission on the lines of former Commissions to be used simply as a means and an excuse for postponement and delay. No such Commission could possibly be demanded by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Irish Benches. The Nationalist Party had just as bitter an experience of Royal Commissions as the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and they had just as lively a sense of the uses to which they had been put by successive British Governments. But that was not what the hon. Member for North Mayo and others desired. The situation in Connaught was perfectly well understood by the Irish people, and by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and in fact by every Irish representative. They had not the slightest doubt as to what the remedy ought to be, and if they had a Government of their own in Ireland there would not be the slightest hesitation in dealing immediately with the grievance and applying the proper remedy. Unfortunately they had to deal with the Members of this House who were the sole authority and their last resort, and under those circumstances he thought it was a fair proposition that for the information of the new Members of this House—who, with all their sympathy towards Ireland could have but a limited amount of information in regard to Irish questions—there should be collected for their use and information within the next few months, in a correct and convincing and convenient form, all the facts and figures in reference to the state of affairs in the west of Ireland. The hon. Member for South Tyrone had invited hon. Members who wished to obtain information to visit Connaught during the recess. He only wished that they would do so, because he was sure the result would be highly beneficial to Ireland, and highly satisfactory to hon. Members themselves. But it was impossible for any such invitation to be accepted, and they could not expect hon. Gentlemen who had come fresh to Irish questions and politics in this House to be acquainted with those terrible things of which every Irish Member was convinced. They could, however, ask the right hon. Gentleman and the Irish Government, whilst giving an undertaking that there should be nothing in the shape of unnecessary delay, to appoint certainly not Irish landlords or men who were prejudiced, but a body of independent, competent, upright gentlemen in whom the public at large would have every confidence, and request them without delay, and with all the advice and assistance which the Irish people would give them, to go to those districts which were particularly affected, get the information, put it into convenient form, and by the time Parliament met next session have it ready, so that they might go to the Government and say, "Here is a statement about which there is no doubt, because it is reported on by this Commission, composed of gentlemen in whom you have confidence, and it is a condition of affairs which we believe you will lose no time whatever in dealing with." That was the position which they took up with reference to the Royal Commission, and it was a reasonable one. The hon. Member for South Tyrone had worked hard and long and brilliantly for the Irish tenant farmers, and nobody recognised that more than the Irish Members. But he would not deny that before he gave the Irish cause that assistance the hon. Member for East Mayo fought strenuously for the Irish tenants and suffered in their cause. Therefore they were the last men to be blind to the danger of a long-delayed Report, but they were asking for something intensely practical that would be of the utmost assistance to the Chief Secretary and the Government in dealing with this question. That was the view which he took, and he thought it was the view taken by Irish Members generally. He would be somewhat disappointed if it was not also the view which would be expressed by the hon. Member for East Mayo, and others who were regarded as the leaders of the Irish Party. Probably some hon. Members might think he had no claim to interfere in this debate in view of the fact that he himself did not represent one of the congested districts. It was a mistake to imagine that this question of congestion in Ireland was confined to the scheduled districts. The Member for Kerry, and other hon. Gentlemen representing districts outside Connaught, could speak with equal certainty of the necessity for the relief of congestion in their own constituencies. He represented the county of Clare which was not, but in many districts it ought to be, scheduled as congested, At any rate, he knew that there were hundreds and thousands of holdings in that county, as well as in Kerry and elsewhere, which were uneconomic and where the people were living in a state of congestion under which there was absolute necessity for the enlargement of their holdings by the breaking up of grass lands. He appealed with great respect and confidence to the Chief Secretary, because he felt convinced that he intended if he could to solve those problems which he went to Ireland to investigate; and if he did not solve them he was sure that it would not be due to any fault on his part. He hoped that nothing would occur to alter that feeling towards the right hon. Gentleman. He appealed to him to give instructions to the Commission to inquire not only in what were called the congested districts, but wherever there might be congestion throughout the land. He asked that the large tracts of untenanted land, whether in Connaught or other parts of Ireland, should be given for the relief of the people in the congested districts. If that was done, there would be a satisfactory settlement of the question. English Members could have no possible idea of the state of affairs in Ireland unless they carefully inquired. It had no parallel in the world. The soil was fertile in the last degree, it was well watered, and the country was favoured by nature in every way; and, yet, what did they find? They found districts where there was more misery and squalor, more want, privation, and hunger, than in any other part of the world. The people were living in houses worse than pig-styes, and side by side with those wretched, overcrowded, insanitary districts, they found large tracts of the most fertile land, where one might travel hour after hour, and mile after mile, without seeing the slightest vestige of humanity. These tracts were as devoid of human beings as the wildest prairie in America, or the most lonely stretch of bush in Australia, while here and there were marks of where human beings had lived not so many years ago—the broken gables and the ruined walls of the little homesteads of the people in days gone by, showing that, if allowed, people could live there again. Were Irishmen unreasonable if they came to this House and asked that the men whose ancestors had been driven from these most fertile tracts should be given an opportunity by fair and reasonable government to cultivate the land? Was not the state of affairs in Ireland the most heartbreaking and miserable thing that could confront any public man? Week after week, and month after month, the flower of the Irish race, the bone and sinew of the people, the youngest and brightest, physically and intellectually, were going to America. Why? To look for land to live upon. They were going across the broad Pacific to New Zealand and to the backwoods of Australia for the same reason; and all the time their native country, with a soil far richer than that of any other country in the world, was in some parts as destitute of human beings as any part of Canada, the United States, or Australia. In God's name he appealed to the Chief Secretary not to allow any influence to dally with this question. He appealed to him to recognise that what was wanted in Ireland was a readjustment which would enable the people to go back to the land and live upon the soil. That would be a relief to Ireland; and would it not be an untold relief to England? What consolation could English Members draw from the fact that last month and the month before something like 12,000 or 15,000 young Irishmen and women went away from their country? The continuance of the present state of affairs in Ireland was a constant danger and menace to England. The representatives of Ireland sympathised with the British people when in this House reforms were sought for the amelioration of their condition; but every week, every month, every year, they were found pleading in the same way that something should be done for Ireland. If the Commission to be appointed was properly worked, and if it reported promptly, evidence would be given that the Irish people had a real grievance: that in asking that they should be given an opportunity of living on the land they were asking something which was good and necessary for their country, and something which, when accomplished, would be a welcome relief and benefit to the British people as well. The people of Ireland said that nothing effective would be done unless compulsory powers to acquire land were granted. He did not deny that there were landlords who were willing to come forward and assist in the settlement of the land question under the Act of 1903, but there were others, like Lord Clanricarde, who could not be moved. He did not know their motive. Goodness knew how it was that they stood out from their fellows and insisted on getting their full pound of flesh under the letter of the law. It did no good to England, and it was a cause of misery, and sometimes bloodshed, in Ireland. For those men who would not act fairly there must be compulsion, and sooner or later it would come. Why should it be delayed? Last year he spent several months in Australia and New Zealand inquiring into the condition of affairs there. They had in many places there a system of compulsion under which lands were broken up and the people were put on the soil, reasonably-sized farms were established, and there was more progress, prosperity, and contentment in those portions of the Empire than in any other part of the world. No man out there would say that when land was compulsorily acquired for the benefit of the public at large anything had been done contrary to justice or repugnant to the British constitution. Those things had been done, and splendid results had followed. There was nothing to be frightened at in compulsion. There were in the county of Clare fifty years ago 260,000 people, no doubt, in many cases, poor, but fairly happy. Now there were barely 100,000 people. Every year a proportion of the young men and women of Clare emigrated, and how could he be otherwise than indignant at the conditions which caused this horrible and unprecedented depopulation? How could he be but indignant in appealing that in justice and in reason there should be no delay in removing one of the greatest grievances that existed in any of the regions presided over by the King at the present moment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) said that no one who knew the state of Ireland would consider that Irish Members had done unwisely in devoting the better part of that Parliamentary day to the discussion of this question. There was no subject which was more acute, none with which legislation and administration had been struggling longer, and none which it was more important should be approached in a practical spirit. He would not occupy time by explaining either the political or the economic forces which had produced what was called congestion in many parts of Ireland. This state of things had continued so long that it was a painful fact that the physical and intellectual character of the people had been affected by it. To him that was the saddest part of the whole matter. It was the part which was the hardest to cure, and it was the most difficult part of the problem for this reason also, that even when they brought about better economic conditions they could not at once have a generation of people who were fit to profit from the better economic condition created. Therefore, though much had been done within the last twenty-five or thirty years, they must not be surprised if the results had not altogether answered their hopes. But, above all, they must hope that that apathy, that want of hopefulness and vigour which had been the result of living under those deplorable conditions, would by degrees pass away in the new condition. What, substantially, was the problem with which they had to deal in the congested districts? A very large part of the people were living upon land which lay in most cases along the seaboard—and in most cases it was very poor land, consisting almost entirely of bog and stone, land which the poor people tried to render valuable by carrying little patches of earth to improve it. It was artificial land which had actually been created on the western coast of Ireland. They might see along parts of the coast of Connemara and the west of Galway, places made up of holdings not exceeding two or three or four acres. But it was also by some tragic fatality in the very places where the holdings were smallest that the land was worst, and therefore to describe the size of the holdings was not to convey any adequate impression of the capacity of the holdings. Life could not have been supported at all in many of those places upon what the land gave —not even with all that patient industry which the people had given to endeavouring to improve their property. They had improved it. The people lived mainly—not on the barren land, but on the produce of the wages which their sons and their daughters earned when they went to work in Scotland. He had seen whole country sides in Ireland which lived almost entirely on what was brought home from three or four months work in Scotland. And there were other parts in the south where the people in the same way went to work in South Wales and brought home money from the mining districts there. But for that assistance the rent could not be paid. Rent in a great many parts of Ireland bore no analogy to those doctrines of economics of which they read at college. He would like to echo the request made by several Irish Members, that English Members should spend part of their vacation in visiting some of these places and islands in the West of Ireland, famous in legend and history. On the coast of Galway people were living entirely off fishing, and obtained practically no living off the land. Fortunately a sort of terrestrial providence had appeared off those islands in the shape of the Congested Districts Board, and as criticisms had been passed on the action of the Board, he would like to ask hon. Members if they found themselves in one of the most beautiful parts of that kingdom—Clew Bay—to make a voyage out to Clare Island and see what had been done by the Congested Districts Board there. There were three ways in which the problem of congestion could be dealt with. The first was by enlarging the holdings. The only way they could do that was by taking a large number of people to inhabit some of them. Secondly, to do that they must have migration, and to migrate people from the congested areas to other areas they must acquire other land. That had been the purpose of the Congested Districts Board. The third was to start other industries, and to give the people other ways of living than that which the soil alone afforded. That had been done with considerable success in some districts. Nothing was more hopeful in the state of Ireland than the improvement in the fisheries of late. He had seen in proof part of the Report for the present year, and hon. Members would find when they obtained it—as he trusted they would before the end of July—a good many interesting and even encouraging facts. They had done a great deal to diminish congestion. In many cases they had rearranged the holdings. That was a much more difficult matter than it might appear, because it would constantly happen that a tenant who had a holding of perhaps only six or seven acres, would have it scattered over fifteen or twenty different pieces of ground, and the first thing that had to be done was to take the whole tract of perhaps thirty or forty or fifty or sixty acres, which was covered with those petty bits of ground into which the holding had been divided, and to bring them together, to induce the tenants to have the land —scattered as it was in that form— and then to have some little attempt at draining and making paths and access between the patches. That was a slow process, and one of considerable difficulty. It was a process which wanted a good deal of tact, in order to persuade tenants to accept the re-arrangement which the Congested Districts Board made for them, and that was one of the causes of the delay which had inevitably arisen in the operations of the Board. Now that had been done, cottages had been improved, and in some cases new cottages had been built. Plans had been supplied for those cottages, and the tenants had been encouraged to build them themselves. Material had been supplied to them in many cases by the Board. The Board had a steamboat which brought cargoes of what was needed by the people, especially in the islands—cargoes of wood to make certain of their implements connected with fishing; and which took their cattle ashore at the time of the fairs, in order that they might be sold, and which also in many ways was able to do for the people—especially of the islands—things which they could never have done for themselves. Of course it was essential in order to relieve congestion that they should be able to migrate tenants. That was attended with considerable difficulty because a good many were not willing to migrate. It was a serious thing to ask a man to go thirty miles away from his own place. He might be told that they went to America. That was true, but they were taken there by their friends; and besides, America had been represented as a place where high wages were to be got, and a great many rents in Ireland could never have been paid, and a great many people could never have subsisted if it had not been for what they got from friends in America. Therefore, migration from one part of Ireland to another was less attractive than going from Ireland to America. Then, again, what was the use of taking a tenant and planting him down in another part of the country, forty or fifty miles from his old home, if they could not give him a house, a little stock, some tools, and a little capital? All these things the Board had to consider, and for that they required money. Then they must endeavour to secure the most promising people. They could not take the first man who offered himself. They must endeavour to search about. All these things, however, the Board had been trying to do, and they had done it, he thought—if with less success than was desired or expected, still it had conferred a great benefit on large classes of the people. A great deal also had been done in the development of the fishing and other industries. Within the last few years an immense fishing industry had sprung up in Donegal. Last year he thought more than £61,000 was the produce of the herring fishing, and that was an industry which had been almost entirely developed by the exertions of the Board. In some parts of Cork and Kerry the fisheries, chiefly mackerel, had been very much aided, partly by the Board and partly by the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Technical Instruction. Instructors had been sent down and efforts had been made to find markets for the mackerel, which efforts in some quarters had been extremely successful. He had been along the coasts during the last two vacations and had found everywhere a more hopeful feeling among fishermen, and the prospect that this industry would continue to yield excellent results. Then they might take lace. There were places in Ireland where the value of the lace and crochet work sold was greater than all the rents paid in the district. The total value of lace made last year exceeded £21,000, and that was besides that which was disposed of by private agents, not known to the Board. He wished to pay a tribute to what had been done not only by the Congested Districts Board, but also by the Estates Commissioners. The Estates Commissioners had powers different from those of the Congested Districts Board in settling tenants upon estates, and in many cases they had succeeded in buying untenanted grazing lands and settling tenants on them. He gathered from what he heard, that in cases in which they had done this the results had been excellent. He believed that there were places where a whole countryside had now been settled by a population. Formerly that land was used for grazing, and industry, peace and harmony had been introduced where formerly there were solitude, destitution and disorder. The Estates Commissioners had done a great deal of excellent work in that way, and if he had time he would like to read papers he had on the subject, showing the admirable work that had been done. It was most encouraging to go among these tenants and see the new spirit of hope and helpfulness which prevailed. The Estates Commissioners had purchased 25,500 acres of these untenanted lands in Galway and Mayo, they had created 220 new holdings, and enlarged 1,300 holdings. He might be told that this was paternal government. Well, it was in a way, but when people had been subjected to adverse and unwholesome conditions for almost two centuries, how could they be expected to stand alone at once, any more than they could expect people who had been kept in a dark dungeon and chained to the floor to stand erect under the sun when they were suddenly brought out. All the paternal work of the Estates Commissioners and the Congested Districts Board was being amply justified, and he hoped it would be continued. He must deal very shortly with some of the complaints which had been made against the action of the Board. He gladly admitted that the general tone of the discussion had been in no way unfair or unkind. Every speaker had recognised—it was impossible not to recognise—the public spirit, the zeal, and the sympathy present in the minds of the Board; and those who knew something of the men who composed the Congested Districts Board would know that there were no better men to be had in Ireland for the work than some of those men, and none with more desire to help their fellow-countrymen. There had been comparatively slow progress in the purchase and re-sale of estates, but that was partly due to the fact that the Board had had to make a great many experiments. It had been a great deal hampered by some provisions of the Act which called it into being. The Board had power to buy land, but it had no power to settle upon the land any tenants except those who came from congested areas, and the definition of a congested area was somewhat artificial. Speaking broadly, the definition of a congested area was by no means one that met the whole problem of congestion. There were a good many districts where real congestion existed, which did not come within the operation of the Board, and thus they were either left untouched, or to such assistance as the Board of Agriculture could give them. The hon. Member for West Kerry had complained with regard to the small services that the Board had rendered to Kerry and Cork as compared with certain other districts. He was not surprised to hear that from him, nor was he surprised to hear it from Members from Cork. It was true that the Board had done comparatively little for those counties. The fact was that there was practically no untenanted land available in Cork or Kerry. That applied also to Donegal. If the Board removed people from these districts to other parts of Ireland, further difficulties would arise. The people would find themselves comparative strangers in Connaught or other counties, and that was one of the reasons why so much could not be done for these people as might at first sight appear possible. The Board had, however, done what they could for the friends of the hon. Members in Kerry and Cork. The best thing they could do for them was to help them to improve their land and to get more out of it and to develop their industry. He believed that in this case that could be done. But the hon. Member must not suppose for a moment that the Board were not aware of what they owed to Cork and Kerry; they were anxious to do all they could in both those districts, but it was not quite so easy to apply the same remedy as that which they had begun to apply in Mayo and Galway. The hon. Member for West Mayo had raised a question about the purchase of land. He was satisfied that the Board had done the best they could for the district which the hon. Member represented, and that they had made most judicious purchases and arrangements. The hon. Member had also raised a question with regard to demesne lands in the county. There were a great many difficult cases with regard to title, and the staff in the office of the Estates Commissioners had not been large enough to grapple with the work. He hoped, however, that as the result of steps which had been taken, the work would proceed at a more rapid rate. The hon. Member had also asked him to give instructions to Judge Ross to sell certain land forthwith. He (Mr. Bryce) thought the hon. Member for West Mayo did not understand the conditions which prevailed. If he did, he would see that he was asking him to do something quite beyond his power. As to the De Freyne estate, the Congested Districts Board were not in the position of owners but of trustees, and they might be called upon to account for everything they did. They were therefore obliged to take proceedings for the recovery of more than they intended to exact from the tenant, but they did not intend to exact more than the rent admittedly due. The hon. Member must not therefore suppose that the Board intended to act unfairly in any way.

MR. HAYDEN said the people were very poor, and a few shillings was a consideration to them.

Mr. BRYCE said he was informed by his right hon. friend who was a high authority upon this subject, that it would not be legal for them to receive rent only for the last year. As to the question of costs he hoped the Board would consider the subject, and that some relief might be given. The hon. Member had also mentioned the case of a sale in the county of Roscommon, where property was bought in because the Board would not buy it. The owner there afterwards sold to a private buyer at a lower price than he would take from the Board. The owner thought because he had the Board to deal with that he could make them pay what he liked, but the Board rightly resisted the attempt, considering that it was not right for them to give the landlord more than his land was worth. The hon. Member for South Galway had mentioned the case of some property in Galway where he said there had been a sale made to the Board of Agriculture, and afterwards to the Estates Commissioners. He (Mr. Bryce) was informed that there was no sale to the Estates Commissioners. Part of the property was sold to the Department of Agriculture, and that was required for the purposes of experiments with model farms, and the Department had also to provide a place to keep bulls, and other stock for the benefit of neighbouring tenants. He thought the sale was perfectly justified. As regarded Mount Shannon he would direct the attention of the Board and the Estates Commissioners to the question of acquiring grazing ground in that direction. The Commissioners were always anxious to use their powers when they could to acquire land with a view to settling tenants. He was sorry to hear the hon. Member say that he would go down and endeavour to make it hot for them. That was not the way in which these cases ought to be dealt with, when they had the machinery to deal with them in a legal way.

Mr. DUFFY asked what was to be done when they had notice that in the West of Ireland the Estates Commissioners sanctioned sales to men already in possession of large grass farms of hundreds of acres and the Government did not interfere.

Mr. BRYCE said that whatever they did they were not to use violence, because they would injure the cause of Ireland by doing so.

Mr. DUFFY said he never used violence.

Mr. BRYCE was glad to hear that. The hon. Member knew that the Estates Commissioners were extremely anxious to get all the land they could for division among tenants. That brought him to another question of great importance, to which several Members had referred. There was a suggestion that a sort of plan of campaign was in operation by certain landlords in the West of Ireland to take advantage of the advantageous terms offered by the Land Purchase Act to sell their estates by auction, to create tenants, and then to get these tenants to buy through the medium of the land purchase machinery, and in that way get a bonus for themselves. That had been attempted in a few cases, but he was glad to say that the attention of the Commissioners was very soon called to the matter, which was what he should call an improper attempt to use the Land Act for purposes for which it was never intended, and which it would have been necessary to stop by legislation if the Commissioners had not found themselves in a position to stop it by administrative action. The Commissioners were doing their best in the matter and they had the means to prevent the Land Act being used in this way. Speaking generally, he would say that when they considered how many difficulties the Board had had to confront, how little experience there was when the Board started out, they had done a great deal of excellent work, and he did not think they deserved anything but recognition on the part of those whom they tried to serve. At the same time he admitted that there were features about the Act which established the Board, and administrative features of the Board's action, which deserved to be carefully studied, and before any request was made to him for consideration of the whole action of the Board, he was coming to the conclusion that the time was approaching when it would be necessary to see whether something could not be done to arm the Board with further powers, to strengthen the Acts under which it proceeded, and to enable it to be more useful to the country. He had done what little he could to see the districts in which it operated and to endeavour to understand the difficulties in its way. Those difficulties were great. The funds at the disposal of the Board did not seem to be sufficient for the discharge of the functions which Parliament had imposed on it. The other difficulties related to migration and the acquisition of land. He agreed with the hon. Member for East Clare that the country possessed nothing like complete statistics, figures, or data with regard to congestion. They ought to know the area and the population, and whether there were districts not now scheduled which ought to be scheduled. They wanted to know also how much more population there was in the congested areas than those areas could support; where the untenanted land existed; and on all these points he thought the information they possessed was very far from satisfactory, and he could not in the least degree agree with the hon. Member for South Tyrone that they had all the information they needed upon these points. Probably he knew all he wanted to know, and probably a large number of Irish Members knew all they had need to know, but English Members and the general public did not know, and when they came to legislation he wanted to have the support of British public opinion in order to deal with these problems. They wanted therefore more complete information, statistically and economically, with reference to the exact state of the country. They also wanted to know the result in a summarised tabulated form of all the experiments which had been so far made, and especially of the migration and the subsidising of industries. If they were to have a Board with greater powers in the future, and if they were to have the work the Board was doing in these districts done in others by another Board, much more complete information than they possessed would be required with regard to what had already been done and with regard to the lines that should be followed in the future. Therefore, he entirely concurred in the views put forward by the hon. Member who opened this discussion that there was a complete case made out for an inquiry. But he was disposed to go further. He did not think it worth while endeavouring to grapple with the problem of congestion here and there; they should grapple with it as a whole. No doubt by far the largest portion of the areas congested were those which came under the present management of the Board, but there were other areas and areas which they might not call in the strictest sense congested where limits similar to those of the congested districts should be applied. They had at present three authorities dealing with this matter—the Congested Districts Board, the Board of Agriculture, and in a certain sense the Estates Commissioners. They felt it was a sort of patchwork to a large extent, where at one point the Estates Commissioners slipped in and the Congested Districts Board slipped out. Taking all these things together he had come to the conclusion that it was extremely important that they should have an inquiry into the whole subject. The importance was even greater when they considered what was being done under the present Act. They were creating tenants who would become owners, and who were paying annuities for their land. It was suggested in some quarters that they were paying too much and that the investment they were making was not perfectly secure. If that were the case it was all the more important that they should throw any light they could upon the question by investigation. He might therefore say that His Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that an inquiry into the problem of congestion in Ireland would be a very proper and seasonable inquiry, that it should be directed to the problem of congestion as a whole and be conducted by a Royal Commission. He heartily echoed the opinion expressed by hon. Members that the Commission ought not to be in any sense partisan, but should be one which would inspire confidence. It was not altogether easy, however, in a country so much divided by political Parties as Great Britain, to find people with absolutely open and dispassionate minds, and all he could say was that he would to do his best to find people who would inspire confidence. He thought the Committee would feel that it was necessary to have confidence all round. They must have a Commission which would inspire the confidence, not only of those for whom hon. Members had spoken, but also of those whose interests might be supposed to be adverse, and also of the large body of opinion both in Great Britain and Ireland and of the two Houses of Parliament whose concurrence was necessary for the passing of legislation. The composition of the Commission was therefore of the utmost importance, and the Government would give to it the most careful consideration. He might tell the Committee that he thought the reference ought to be wide and comprehensive, and he hoped the matter would not be one of political or economic controversy. He cherished the hope that there was growing up in Ireland a feeling amongst landlords and tenants that this question had got to be settled, and that the sooner it was settled the better. He thought they might rely upon that sentiment, and that it might be possible to find men from both sides who, on the one hand, would not endeavour to press for measures which would excite strong opposition on either side, and, on the other, would admit that the so-called sacred rights of property must give way to the general public convenience and necessity. That was their hope. In any legislation that might follow —and of course it was the hope and wish of the Government that legislation should follow—their desire would be to find a settlement. He did not know how long the inquiry would take, but the Committee might take it that when they appointed a Commission they meant business. He would fain express the hope that they would have support from all classes, and that those who would have to administer any legislation passed would have support, in the first place, from the people themselves by their endeavour to facilitate the Commission that was appointed, and, as he thought the tenants generally did, to put a little trust in the Board and to believe that they were acting for the benefit of the tenants themselves. In the second place, he hoped they would have support from the public spirit of the landlords, and there were many landlords who felt that they must recognise that the social order and peace of Ireland were involved in the settlement of this question, and that they must endeavour to facilitate legislation. Lastly, he hoped they would have the support of the leaders of the people whether they were lay or ecclesiastical—that they would feel that, if this question was to be settled soon and finally, it was of the utmost importance it should be settled in times of peace and tranquility. They were now favoured with these conditions. He hoped they would last, and he ventured to say to hon. Members that they could do nothing more to help a Government which earnestly desired to help them than by endeavouring to help to preserve in Ireland that peace and tranquility which would make it far easier to pass and to carry out the legislation which they hoped to introduce.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork) said the Chief Secretary had made an important and interesting statement, and he for one would be very slow indeed to throw cold water upon any proposal that might come from the right hon. Gentleman in the difficult position in which he was sometimes placed. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for South Tyrone as to the history of Royal Commissions in general in Ireland. But whatever might be the upshot of the Royal Commission that was now announced nothing could be worse than the stagnation in which this great question of the redistribution of the land to the population of Connaught had lain for the past two years. On the whole his belief in Royal Commissions was as little as that of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. Nevertheless, under all the circumstances, he for one was quite willing to believe that this Commission, inspired as it was by the present Chief Secretary, might by some possibility prove to be the exception. The whole thing would depend absolutely upon its personnel. He had some hope, and even a certain amount of confidence, that the Commission would be so composed as to give to their recommendations a weight which would ensure their being respected. In his opinion the remedy for the heart-breaking state of things in the West of Ireland was to be found in quite a different direction from anything that had been said; but he did not wish to press his own views too much at this moment. He entirely understood the able defence that the Chief Secretary had made of the Congested Districts Board. He entirely agreed with the high eulogium of the character of the persons who composed that Board, but, whatever services they might have rendered and undoubtedly did render upon a half dozen or so estates, and giving them every credit for their splendid intentions and public spirit, he for one was absolutely convinced from his experience of the West of Ireland that their function, so far as the land was concerned, was a completely obsolete one and that the money might as well have been thrown into the bog so far as a great and far-reaching settlement was concerned. He was convinced that the Congested Districts Board ought to be abolished, as it would be under its own Act in five or six years, and its revenue ought to be handed over to the Estates Commissioners for stocking and equipping small colonies of farmers' sons migrated from certain districts. If that transfer were made, if there were these additional powers, a repeal of the mutilation of the Act of 1903 by the House of Lords, and compulsory powers, then within two or three years, if they went the right way about it, there would be nothing to prevent the Congested Districts Board from buying up a million acres of untenanted land in the West of Ireland and setting the tenants to work instead of wasting another generation, as the Congested Districts Board had done, in buying up ten or fifteen estates and throwing away £100,000 a year. Under the circumstances, and knowing that the right hon. Gentleman was not making his proposal with any desire of procrastination, he for one wished him godspeed. He was delighted that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to extend the scope of the Commission to all states of congestion in Ireland, and he could only say that he hoped above all that he would pick out men for the Commission whose names would give weight to their decisions, and who would stand no nonsense, but go thoroughly into the subject.

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the clock, and there being Private Business set down by direction of the Chairman of Ways and Means under Standing Order No. 8, further Proceeding was postponed without Question put.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1906-7.

Class II.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £110,146, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1907, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Agriculture and other Industries and Technical Instruction for Ireland, and of the services administered by that Department, including sundry Grants in Aid."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £110,046 be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Conor O'Kelly.)

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry, S.) said that after the speech of the Chief Secretary, it was not necessary to labour the subject they had been discussing any further; but he wished to take this opportunity of calling attention to some matters connected with the work of the Congested Districts Board in South Kerry in the hope that it might be to the advantage of Ireland. Owing to the rise in the price of copper, there had been a good many inquiries recently into the possibilities of copper mining in Ireland. There was one large estate upon which a prospector had been inquiring, and he believed from all accounts that there were very hopeful prospects, if the mines could be worked. Unfortunately, owing to the state of the law, there was no possibility of giving leases for the working of these mineral rights; and he urged upon the Attorney-General for Ireland the advisability of finding some means by which the Congested Districts Board might be able to grant such leases. The development of the copper mining industry in Ireland would provide not only considerable employment, but open up a great industrial future in certain districts. When the legal differences had been surmounted he believed that the profits to be derived should to some extent accrue to the benefit of the tenants there. He did not say that those tenants were to be actual participators in the mining rights; but whatever system was evolved something ought to be set aside out of the profits for the benefit of the whole district, so that when the tenants had become the possessors of their holdings, the mineral rights would accrue to their advantage; and when the mines were being worked, a portion of the profits might go to assist in building up other industries in the district. One great difficulty in the constitution of the Congested Districts Board was that they had no direct representative from either Kerry or Cork; and, although there was no vacancy at the present time, he trusted that when one occurred they would appoint someone who possessed a direct knowledge of the local needs of both those counties. They wanted a man appointed from their own district possessing local knowledge. Some time ago Lord Shaftesbury was appointed, but he could never have that local knowledge of the fishing industry that was so necessary. It was of the greatest importance that some direct representative of those counties should be on the Board. He thought that most people would recognise, as regarded the industrial side of its operations the Board had done a great deal of useful work. Lace classes had been started in his district, and he knew of three girls who had their passage money sent them to go to America; but their prospects in the lace industry were such that they refused the money and preferred to remain in the lace trade. He thought the Congested Districts Board should endeavour to establish suitable industries in the rural districts. There was very great competition, and they felt this more particularly because of the great amount of imitation Irish lace that was put upon both the English and the American markets. It was certainly necessary for them to keep up the standard of Irish lace by good designs and of the utmost importance that they should protect Irish lace from being imitated and sold. The Chief Secretary knew the value of a trade mark and they were going to register a national trade mark for all Irish manufactures. He suggested that the Congested Districts Board would be of real value in this matter if it would instruct all its lace classes to take advantage of the Irish national trade mark and use it on every article of lace they turned out, because, by that means they would protect a really important and growing Irish industry. He believed that purchasers both in this country and in America would then begin to demand as a proof of the genuineness of the article those goods upon which the Irish national trade mark was to be found. The same precautions also applied to the homespun industry. Once a cottage industry spring up and was successful, imitations were produced in other countries, and he thought it would startle many people if they how much imitation homespun goods were made in Yorkshire and Lancashire mills and sold on the English market. If in some way through the Congested Districts Board this industry could be protected by the national trade mark he hoped it would be done. He also wished to urge upon the Chief Secretary that they required for the development of Irish herring and mackerel industry what they had already got in Scotland, namely, a national brand which enabled Scottish herrings to be known all over the world. During the last twenty-four years by means of branding fees £50,000 had become available for the Scottish fishing industry, and if a similar system of branding was instituted in the districts where the Congested Districts Board had charge of the matter it would be of the greatest possible value to the fishing industry in Ireland. The big curers were able to obtain a sale for their fish because they were well known, but the claim for the national brand for cured herrings and mackerel was on behalf of the small curers and buyers who could not compete with the big men, and it would enable the Irish cured fish trade to be put in a better position than at the present moment. With regard to the land question there was an estate in his district in process of being sold to which he thought it would be well if the Congested Districts Board turned its attention immediately; he referred to the Glenbeigh Estate. He understood that there was some little difficulty as to the actual terms, and he urged that the chief inspector who had charge of the negotiations should be sent down to the district to try and arrange an amicable settlement. He thought the misunderstanding was in regard to the arrears.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.) said he agreed with his hon.

friends in all that had been said as to the Congested Districts Board. It was one of the best institutions of its kind in Ireland, and if it had not succeeded it had not been from want of will, but from want of the proper facilities which he hoped would shortly be given to it, or to some similar institution. The speech of the Chief Secretary would revive hope in the hearts of the Irish people, and give those in the congested districts some prospect of a satisfactory settlement of their unfortunate condition. Although he was not a great believer in Royal Commissions, he hoped that the one now to be appointed, under more favourable and happier auspices than some of those which had formerly inquired into Irish questions, would be followed by good results. It was to be appointed by an Administration which they believed meant business in the matter. It would be appointed to carry out a definite work of urgent importance, and he thought a stimulus towards the fruition of the work would be found this time in Ireland which had been absent, perhaps, in the case of other Commissions. The whole thing would depend, in the first place, on the personnel of the Commission. If proper people were appointed, determined that the work entrusted to them should be carried to a practical conclusion, it might be hoped that the inquiry would be attended with good results. A good deal would depend also on the terms of reference. If they were sufficiently wide to embrace the various matters germane to the question of the distribution of the land, and the question of the encouragement of industries in districts where new operations could be carried on, they might expect good results. He impressed on the Government the desirability of appointing a really good and practical Commission, consisting of men in whom everybody would have confidence and with terms of reference so wide as to give hopes of a satisfactory result. He tendered his congratulations to the Government on the appointment of the Commission.

MR. FARRELL (Longford, N.) expressed the hope that the terms of reference of the Commission would be sufficiently wide to embrace an inquiry into the conditions in areas which were not at present within the definition of "congested districts." In his own constituency there were three parishes, not one of which would be regarded as a "congested district," but in which there were 500 holdings, the average valuation of which did not exceed £4, and from these places quite a considerable number of labourers went to England and Scotland to take part in harvest operations, thereby fulfilling the conditions which were applied in Kerry and Donegal. He hoped the terms of reference would enable the Commission to deal with such cases. He wished to point out to the Attorney-General that during the past few months the tenants had been trying to purchase their holdings on a number of estates, but owing to the excessive terms asked by the landlords it had been impossible to buy except in one case. He was perfectly certain that if this inquiry was fair and far reaching enough there would be discovered to be here and there throughout Ireland a considerable number of districts which were congested very seriously and where the people were living quite as badly as in the parts of the West so eloquently described by his hon. friends. There was hardly any county in the whole of Ireland which had suffered more from the drain of population than Longford. The population had fallen in sixty years from 112,000 to 41,000. There were large tracts of grazing land in the county which should be made available for enlarging the non-economic holdings. He hoped ample powers would be conferred either on a newly-created Congested Districts Board or on some other new body which would enable them compulsorily to acquire these grass lands or the benefit of the poor people who were now in bogs or on the mountain side.

MR. BRIGG (Yorkshire, W.R., Keighley) said he was an old friend of Ireland. He had been to the country for the purpose of seeing the state of things which prevailed. As he was only a short time there his experience might not be of much value, but still some value might attach to the opinion of one who saw a country for the first time, and who had lived in other countries where the natural conditions were very similar. The part of England where he resided would be very like some parts of Ireland were it not for the advantages enjoyed from the manufactures carried on in the district. He went to Ireland as a Home Ruler, and when he came back he was more convinced in favour of Home Rule than before. Although a great deal might be done for Ireland by means of legislation, he was convinced that if the present laws were administered either by Irishmen or by those who were in sympathy with the people, the country would be in a much better and happier state than it was at present. There was a large amount of water power in Ireland at present unused which might be employed in the development of new industries. He knew a gentleman of substantial means who was quite prepared to start a new business with the aid of water power and give employment to a large number of people. That gentleman promoted a Bill in Parliament to acquire water rights, but when the Bill went to the House of Lords he was ashamed to say that one of the Peers suggested that it was a very improper thing to allow any interference with the landlords, a sentiment which was echoed by another noble Lord. The Bill was thrown out and the whole enterprise squashed. He thought also something could be done in the promotion of the manufacture of home-made woollen stuffs in Ireland. He had seen a good deal of this home-made stuff and he could say that it was very excellent. He agreed with his hon. friend opposite as to the inefficiency of Royal Commissions. Their common result was to shunt things indefinitely. He himself had gone through the congested districts, and had seen what the Board had done, and what they had not done. It did not require a Royal Commission to inquire into all these matters. He hoped that his hon. friends from Ireland would miss no opportunity of bringing the wretched condition of the people in the congested districts before the Government and the country so that everything should be done for their improvement, as a matter of common sense, and for the welfare, not only of Ireland, but of Great Britain at large.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.) said he spoke on behalf of the Irish Members when he thanked the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down for the sympathetic manner in which he had spoken of Ireland. He sympathised fully with the demands which had been put forward in connection with the condition of the West of Ireland at the present time, but he hoped that the Government would not forget that the condition of the South also required to be considered. He agreed with what his colleagues had said as to the personnel of the Congested Districts Board, but thought that the Board could do more than it had done to promote small industries in the congested districts of Kerry. For instance, in Killarney, beautiful lace was produced, which had won the first prize at the horse show in Dublin, and also in America. In fact that lace was regarded as superior to any which could be produced in other districts. Here again was an opportunity for the Board to encourage the carrying on of this industry amongst the poor people of the crowded districts. As to the land question, two farms had been purchased by the Board near the Lake of Killarney under very peculiar circumstances. During the administration of the Congested Districts Board by the right hon. Member for Dover, these farms were acquired for £150, but the tenants claimed that their interest was £2,000. An opportunity was afforded the Board of migrating people from the congested districts to these farms, but nothing had been done in the matter, and the farms remained practically derelict. That was a waste of public money, and he thought that the Board should negotiate for the re-instatement of the former tenants. He had put this case before the Members of the Board, from some of whom he had received the greatest sympathy and attention. He hoped that the new conditions of things would give new opportunities, and that this question, which if neglected, was bound to lead to unfortunate conditions for many people, would be dealt with by the Board in the same spirit that they had evinced in other cases. He also wanted to call attention to the fact that there was a considerable congested district in the county of Kerry, viz., that in which the moving bog disaster took place a few years ago. That disaster swept away a whole family of ten persons and caused much damage and suffering.

He believed that it originated in the fact that the outlet from the bog had not been kept in proper condition. What happened on that occasion might happen very shortly again. If the Board would send an inspector to examine the bog at the outlet it would be found that the statement which he had made was quite true. A considerable amount of employment might be given to the poor people in the district in making the repairs at the outlet so as to prevent any future disaster. In that particular locality there were a large number of small cottiers. He could offer no opinion at the present moment as to how those people could be best dealt with, but he knew that physically and intellectually they were equal, if not superior, to the people of other districts of Ireland. He thought the Congested Districts Board ought to have found employment for the young men and young women in the district before now instead of, through their neglect, causing them to migrate or emigrate. He had called the attention of the Congested Districts Board to the condition of things, but nothing had been done. The only large farm in the district was in the autumn put up for sale by auction, but the Board, although their attention was called to the matter, failed to negotiate for the purchase of the farm, and outsiders, shopkeepers and others, stepped in and purchased it and one certain form of relieving the congestion was stopped for ever. He believed that that was due not to the carelessness or the neglect of the members of the existing Board, but entirely to the absence of local knowledge of the necessities of the district. He believed that the members of the Board were sympathetic and that they wished to do their best, but it was impossible for them to take proper action without some local representation in the district. Therefore he put it to the right hon. Gentleman that means should be taken to give the South of Ireland some more effective representation on the Board than they had at present. He hoped the promised Commission would report speedily, and that its labours would be attended with good results. The success attained by the Congested Districts Board in the small undertakings in which it had been engaged would, he hoped, be the forerunner of larger successes in the future.

*MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.) said the present Government would go down to history as the Government of Royal Commissions, and he regretted that yet another Royal Commission was to be appointed to investigate the labours of the Irish Congested Districts Board. They had had some discussion as to the proceedings of that Board, and some of the criticisms had been adverse and some complimentary. The hon. Member who spoke last said he hoped the Board might in the future add to their successes, and it was cheering to know that some of their Nationalist friends thought that the Board had achieved any successes at all, because heretofore, nobody listening to the speeches of Members of that Party would have thought that it had done anything but squander a great deal of money without achieving any result. He was pleased that the Chief Secretary felt it right to pay his tribute to the work which the Board had done. The right hon. Gentleman had said that much good work had been done by it, and he hoped he might be permitted, as one who did not represent a district in which the Board conducted operations, but as one who knew Ireland well, to add his tribute in regard to the work. The Board, although its work might be slow, had done much for the betterment of the people of Ireland. He only criticised the appointment of a Royal Commission from the point of view that outside it might convey the idea that the Board had not done its work properly; but he did not object to the inquiry, because he ventured to predict that its report would be to justify the existence of the Board and to give increased confidence in regard to the discharge of the functions with which it was charged. Various direct and indirect attacks had been made upon the Agricultural and Technical Department of Ireland. He himself had probably criticised the Department as strongly as anybody, but he believed that, considering the short time it had been in existence, it had done very real and solid work of a high standard of excellence. He did not, therefore, desire to associate himself with the attacks which had been made upon the Department that afternoon, especially as a Royal Commission was going to sit in judgment upon it. In an important town in his own constituency, very shortly after the Department came into existence, and after repeated interviews with the officials of that Department, they embarked on an important enterprise of technical education. They started a school and it had been a great success. A Department yet so young was bound to make mistakes in carrying forward such matters as technical and agricultural education. It had been admitted that Ireland was exceedingly far behind in these important branches of education. In this connection he paid a tribute to Sir Horace Plunkett. For many years that gentleman had seemed to be casting his bread upon the waters, but finally the Government gave him a sympathetic ear.

MR. FLAVIN: Your friends helped to shove him out of the House of Commons.

*MR. BARRIE said that such interruptions only showed that sometimes a man who deserved the best at the hands of his country was the last to receive it. Ireland had no more unselfish worker than Sir Horace Plunkett. In the early days of the movement they knew that he refused to accept the salary that his office carried with it, and he feared their Nationalist friends were unable to produce another public officer who had acted in a similarly unselfish manner; if they were he would be happy to add this tribute of respect to him also. When our honoured King visited Ireland some years ago he had testimony given from the day of landing until he left Ireland from all public bodies—no matter what their political complexion was—emphasising the greatness of the work which Sir Horace was doing for Ireland. He (Mr. Barrie) had only met Sir Horace once, and even then only in an official capacity, but he had been impressed by the unselfishness of his labours and the sincerity of his desire to raise the educational standard of Ireland. He hoped the result of the inquiry that was going on would be to place on a more permanent and enlarged basis this important work of technical and agricultural education. The Member for South Tyrone had been very sarcastic about the value of this Royal Commission. He differed from the hon. Member in that respect. He did not think the Chief Secretary would endeavour to mislead the House by the promise of a Royal Commission unless he desired to give some effect to the recommendations of such a Commission, and he desired to say, as representing an Ulster constituency, that if the Commission recommended that further facilities should be given to relieve congested districts the Ulster Members would not be the last to fall in with any reasonable recommendations. They had listened to the dismal tale, told in eloquent language, of the condition of the people of Ireland. but he did not think they had heard quite sufficient of the other side of the picture. Englishmen were too prone to forget that three-fourths of Ireland was more prosperous and happier than it was a quarter of a century ago. Whatever side they looked at it would be seen that the average condition of the people of Ireland was far better to-day than it was twenty-five years ago. Even in Ulster they deplored the gradual decrease of population, but he believed that that was caused not by the reasons stated by hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, but by the long-continued unprofitable character of the agricultural industry. He hoped and believed with all the remedial measures now being taken, the growing improvement in the condition of the people would continue and increase. In conclusion he wished to refer to the remark of an English Member that he returned from a visit to Ireland a more confirmed Home Ruler than he went. He ventured to say that had he extended his visit a little further north and a little further south of the congested districts, to Belfast, Cork or Dublin, he would have found the people there just as prosperous and just as keen to take advantage of business opportunities as the people in any of the important towns in this country. The hon. Member for South Tyrone was from his speech to-night rapidly travelling towards hon. Gentlemen sitting below the gangway. He wished them joy of their new recruit. The Ulster Party had valued his association with them in the past, but they had now come to the conclusion that they would rather know for certain where he was than see him any longer suspended between heaven and earth like Mahomet's coffin.

*MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) said that twenty-five years ago he went to Ireland to look into this question for himself. He had then the great opportunity of going among the people themselves and of hearing their story told in their own way with a sincerity, truth, and eloquence born of experience which he could not forget. He went on to one of the largest estates in Ireland and heard from tenant after tenant how one by one the privileges enjoyed by their ancestors had been gradually taken away by landlords or their agents who hardly seemed to know what they were doing, until it became practically impossible for the tenants to live. He heard how in other days they had free turf, free seaweed, free kelp, free cattle runs, and how one after another these privileges had been taken away, privileges which taken each by itself meant so little in money,but which taken together meant all the difference between a happy and prosperous tenantry and the servile condition into which they had been driven inch by inch. He went to Ireland with an open mind and came back a confirmed Home Ruler—a believer in Home Rule not given all at once,but patiently and gradually acquired. The striping of farms had been referred to, and whilst he believed striping, if conducted under the supervision of some public authority, would be a perfectly harmless operation, he was bound to say he had seen farms striped by agents in cases where the rights of the tenants had not been considered in any way and he came back indignant when he was made to understand what he had seen. Whenever the tenants rights' were taken in hand by the Government, he hoped these adjustments would be made with honesty, fairness, and with sympathy for the people. When on this visit, he had an opportunity of visiting an Irish landlord of the old type, and he could not fail to see that this Gentleman, Mr. Mahony, of Dromore, was really the keystone of the social fabric of the community in which he lived. The government of his estate was a paterna government of the best character, because the character of the man was good; he was a born Irishman and understood the needs of the people amongst whom he lived. It seemed to him that there was no country in which personality was so important as in Ireland; when the people trusted those who were their natural leaders they gave such loyalty as would not be found in any other part of the world. He was glad to hear that a Royal Commission was to be appointed. The efficacy of a Royal Commission depended upon the men who composed it, the subjects which were submitted to its examination, and upon the men who comprised the Government of the country the Royal Commission represented. He earnestly hoped that all Parties in Ireland had sufficient belief in the present Government to be quite certain that the men appointed on this Commission would be chosen, not because they belonged to a particular creed or Party, but because they were men who would do justice as between England and Ireland, and that their labours would result in permanent benefit to the country. One other matter he wished to refer to. As an Englishman he had no particular bias towards any particular one of the sections into which Ireland was from time to time divided, but he could not but admire the wonderful power of combination which had made the agriculture of Ireland at once the envy and admiration of many of our English farmers. The power of combination which during recent years had been aroused among the farmers of Ireland was an object lesson to the farmers of England. He need only mention the name of Sir Horace Plunkett in connection with that work of combination which had raised many thousands of Irish tenant farmers from the verge of starvation to a position of comfort and even prosperity which they had never before enjoyed.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said he would be expressing the feelings of his colleagues when he said they were exceedingly glad when an Englishman took part in these discussions, particularly one who showed such a great power of sympathy with the Irish people as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He believed that if any Englishman went over to Ireland in the spirit in which the hon. Member had gone, he would return a strong Home Ruler. The debate that day had been a very important and satisfactory one. They wanted to have an inquiry into the whole problem of congestion. All over the country the people had been turned off the rich lands and on to the poor lands, in some counties on a larger scale and in others on a smaller scale. It was not only a Connaught problem. What about Meath, King's County, Tipperary, and a long list of counties where there was to be found desolation and loneliness over tens of thousands of acres of the richest land in the world? Leaving this kind of land, one would suddenly pass on to a bog or stony mountain, and there find a crowd of people. Those people had been driven off the rich land by the operation of long centuries of evil laws, which were more ghastly and complete in their irresistible power than any war. He had heard with amazement the statement of the hon. Member for North Londonderry, that the condition of things in Ireland was not so bad as they said, and that it was due to the unprofitable condition of Irish agriculture. Was there ever a more monstrous statement and one which indicated a greater ignorance of the subject? The clearances in Ireland were carried out during a time when agriculture had reached its utmost point of prosperity; therefore such observations only showed that the hon. Member was not fit to discuss the matter at all. A good deal had been said about the Congested Districts Board. It had been often criticised by himself as well as by other Members, but never in an unfair or an unfriendly spirit. The Board was set up in 1891 by the present Leader of the Opposition to deal with the dreadful state of things to be found in the West of Ireland. If hon. Members would look at the original clauses of the Act setting up the Board, they would see that a more preposterous set of clauses was never passed. The right hon. Gentleman felt that something had to be done, and the Board was given some money but no powers, and told to go to the West of Ireland and do something. The Board was faced with an enormous difficulty, and the result was they were able to do exceedingly little. It was not the fault of the Board, but the insufficiency of legislation under which they came into being, and the whole history of the last sixteen years had been a history of new Acts smuggled through this House after midnight—somewhat in the way that the Musical Copyright Bill was now being tried to be passed through—by stripping off everything that was contentious, in order to aid the Congested Districts Board. With all these Acts the powers of the Board were quite inadequate for the work they had to perform, and therefore he had never lent himself to an ungenerous or a carping criticism of the Board, who had done their best. They had made mistakes, but they had had to travel an untrodden road. They were the first body that ever brought any practical sympathy or help whatever to this poor deserving population, and they had done a good deal, considering their resources. Therefore it would be the most unjust, foolish, and fatuous course to attack or criticise in a hostile spirit the action of these gentlemen. What they wanted was more power, more money, and reorganisation. They were asking the Government in point of fact to undo the work of two centuries, and it was impossible to resettle Ireland unless they were prepared to spend a million or two upon it. But was it not worth that, or a good deal more? It would be quite easy with proper machinery and a very moderate sum of money to turn this poor starving population, which had been the despair of British statesmen and the reproach of the Empire, into a prosperous and happy people. The Congested Districts Board was a Board of unpaid men, and they met only once a month. They had acted as pioneers and had shown what could be done. He did not share the somewhat pessimistic views put forward by the Chief Secretary as to the extent of the work, for in his opinion only the fringe of the task had been touched. In the spots where they had operated the Board had done admirably, but they had only touched the fringe of the subject. In the constituency which he represented they had done marvellously. If hon. Members came over to Ireland he advised them to pay a visit to East Mayo. The Congested Districts Board had bought an estate in Mayo, owned by an absentee landlord, who for about forty years had never spent one farthing on the estate, although he had been drawing from it about £20,000 a year in rents. On that estate there were 4,000 little tenants paying £4 a year which they earned by coming over to this country to work in the harvest field. The Board had spent £60,000 on improvements where £500 had not been spent during the previous century, and that money went largely into the pockets of the people for making roads and fences, and draining the land. By a proper system of drainage the Board had reclaimed and created some 1,500 acres of land for these people. It was hard to get an Irish farmer to admit that he had received any benefit, but one farmer had admitted to him that by this new drainage he had got thirteen acres of land for nothing. That result only proved what an enormous benefit it was to spend money in that way in Ireland. An additional difficulty in the solution of this question was that it was more difficult to get an Irish tenant to migrate a distance of twenty-five miles in his own country, than it was to get him to go to Boston or Massachusetts or Philadelphia. In going to America they knew they were going to their friends, but they had the greatest reluctance to migrate from one county to another, because they felt they were going among strangers. Was that not an additional argument in favour of instant action to solve this problem? Would it be believed that after fifteen years the law was in this chaotic and preposterous condition? Where the grazing land was close by the congested districts the Board could do nothing. They bought a farm in one instance, but on account of the state of the law the wretched little holders of land close by could not have any addition to their holdings, and the Board had to bring tenants from a distance, with the result that there was an agitation about the introduction of strangers in the district. The same thing was going on all over Ireland. All they had to do was to buy the grass lands, and without expense or difficulty of moving they could solve the problem by increasing the small holdings of adjacent tenants. That was one of the reasons why it was impossible for the Congested Districts Board to give satisfaction. It was no use for the Chief Secretary to say that they had now got machinery at work which was doing its best to solve the problem. The administrators of this policy must be furnished with sufficient powers to carry it out. On the Clanricarde estate tenants had been waiting in misery for three years to get the benefit of the Act of 1903, which, they were told, was to restore every evicted tenant in Ireland within a few months. Within a stone's throw of the Clanricarde estate there were tens of thousands of acres of the finest land in Ireland. He did not see why the Government should not deal with Lord Clanricarde now in the interests of law and order in Ireland. He agreed with his hon. friend in thinking that one of the good things which the last Government did was the appointment of the Estates Commission. They were honest men most anxious to carry out the policy of Parliament, but powers had not been given to them to do it. Their hands were tied. The Chief Secretary had made a strong appeal, almost given a warning, to the hon. Member for South Galway in regard to the preservation of order. He could quite understand the feeling which prompted the right hon. Gentleman to make the observation. But was it not hard to ask his hon. friend to be patient in view of the condition of the people? He was as a rule entirely averse to Royal Commissions in regard to Irish matters. He approved this one because it might conduce to keeping the people quiet during the summer. If there were no such sign of coming relief how could they say to their people "have patience"? For half a century the Irish people had been taught that if they were patient they got nothing, but that when there was plenty of disturbance and violence this House hastened to legislate. For heaven's sake let them not be taught that lesson again. He and his friends desired to keep the country peaceable, and their influence would be exercised in that direction. One of their strongest motives for supporting the appointment of the Royal Commission was that they could go back to the people and say that there was to be an inquiry. He believed that would help them to induce the people to have more patience, and to give the Chief Secretary a chance. The appointment of the Commission would give the people some hope that, in spite of their bitter experience in the past, there was really an intention to get at the facts of the case and to do something. He believed that this Royal Commission under the present Government would not be a mere postponing machinery, but that something would be done quickly. The Cowper Commission was appointed in the month of October on the motion of Lord Randolph Churchill, and it reported in January or February, and legislation took place that session.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What was behind it?

MR. DILLON said the Plan of Campaign was behind it. But did the hon. Gentleman wish him to start another Plan of Campaign? The very observation of the hon. Gentleman showed how strong his case was. They would do their best to keep the country quiet. The House of Lords, by the introduction of unfortunate words into the Act of 1903, destroyed that measure practically, but even without those words the Act would have been inoperative. Within his own observation estates which under the old Act sold at ten years' purchase had had twenty-four years' purchase offered for them. The Act of 1903 had enabled the landlords to raise prices between 50 and 100 per cent.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL reminded the hon. Member of the powers conferred by Clause 9 of the Act. Mr. Dillon said that that was the way in which the Act of 1903 had operated on these western lands. It had raised the price at least 50 or 100 per cent. In all those western states there was a deadlock at this moment, because the landlord was actually asking—and getting, too, he was sorry to say—twenty-four years purchase for his land. That was one of the chief obstacles, and until it was overcome by compulsory powers and a fair valuation it would be impossible to settle the question of the land. It was perfectly true that some of these little farms was not good security at twenty-four years purchase, and it would be dishonest of him not to tell the truth in regard to these matters. The British public had never lent money on better security than on Irish land, but it must be at a fair price. There was also the question of arrears of rent. For years the western landlords had let the land at a preposterous rent, which they did not expect to get and could not get. But they let the rent run on and took what they could and carried on the arrears. And there were estates in the west where there were seven or eight or nine years arrears of rent carried on for a period of twenty-five years. Were they going to shut their eyes and buy over for dishonest landlords at a fictitious price what was more or less a bad debt, and then undertake the invidious task of collecting those arrears? The first thing they ought to do with those landlords was to make them show their books and thus see what rent they really got. These were all matters to be inquired into. There was another point. The whole curse of Ireland had arisen from the practice of competitive rents and of trading on the fact that they had in Ireland an agricultural people with no other means of living. Seeing the time coming for the effort to settle the people, the landlords divided up their land into small sections so as to get the hunger for the land into operation. The result was that the land so split up was sold, it was taken by shopkeepers and others, and was gone for ever for the purposes of that Act. Thus they were setting up landlordism again all over the country and losing the possibility of settling this congested question. And by and by, when they had got the machinery for solving the congested problem, they would find that there was no land left. That was another reason why he wished to see this Commission constituted. He believed it would be a fresh declaration to Ireland of the policy of the Government, and that when people saw the Commissioners of this Parliament going round Ireland and mapping these lands for the use of the people, public opinion would be entirely too strong for any man to come in and take those lands. He believed that if the Commission was honestly and properly carried into effect, as he had no doubt the Chief Secretary intended that it should be, it would serve a double purpose. It would satisfy Ireland and aid them in preaching patience to their people, and it would place in a reliable form the facts of the Irish situation, and thus enable Parliament to bring to an end the present deplorable condition of affairs.

MR. HUGH LAW (Donegal, W.) thought that they should be exceedingly glad that the Government had assented to the appointment of a Royal Commission, because they all believed that it was a forward and not a backward step as his hon. friend the Member for South Tyrone seemed to think. They believed that the Commission would work rapidly and accumulate materials for the working out of the real remedy for a state of things the finding of a remedy for which had for many and many a year taxed the ingenuity of statesmen of both countries. It was an unfortunate fact that in spite of all the legislation of the past quarter of a century the very people whose sufferings perhaps more than anything else contributed towards the starting of the land agitation had profited less by that legislation than any other class. He knew many estates in which the conditions which had been described had existed for generation after generation, and the people had been condemned to the same state of misery which they now knew. Unless something revolutionary occurred no change in their state for the better was possible. In the fifteen years that had elapsed since the Congested Districts Board was first started many changes had occurred in Ireland, and he would be the very last man to say that that Board had done nothing for the districts which it was charged to administer. On the contrary, he entirely joined with the Chief Secretary in praise of the admirable work which the Board had done in relation to many things and especially in relation to the affairs of the Western Coast of Ireland, although naturally Irish Members wished they would do more. As regarded the land, however, he was afraid that there was no question at all as to their action, and that there was really no answer to what his hon. friend the Member for East Mayo had said, that the Board was not equal to the task which was thrown upon it, viz., the resettlement of Western Ireland and the congested districts. He would venture to suggest, moreover, that even after the resettlement of the land had been accomplished there would remain other questions and problems to be settled, and he quite agreed that concurrently with the question of the land, which was of the greatest importance, the Government would consider those other questions which also were very important in connection with the congested districts. For instance, he hoped that the Government would consider at the same time as the land question the question of transit as it affected the West of Ireland, and that they would also consider the very difficult problem of local taxation. They had had some very remarkable evidence before the Royal Commission on Local Taxation showing the manner in which taxes pressed upon the poorest parts of the country, and anyone who had read that evidence would see that after the re-settlement of the land there would remain matter for further consideration in regard to the future welfare of the people. Having said that, he wished to express the pleasure which they all felt at the step which the Government had announced their intention to take. There was no question that the reason for the condition of the congested districts was a matter as well worthy of the attention of the Government as many a thing which made a greater noise, because they had got there really to undertake the uplifting of the whole of the people. They heard a great deal now-a-days about people being got back to the land, and he had recently read a report by the Commissioners who were appointed to consider some proposals made by Mr. Rider Haggard for migration from the cities to land in the United Kingdom, and those proposals were considered with a certain amount of favour. It was suggested that they should spend large sums in getting people back from the cities on to the land, but it would be much simpler if they began at the other end. In Ireland they had people who were on the land, and who would be only too delighted to stop there if the Government gave them a chance. They had a people who clung to the land with a devotion perhaps unequalled in any other part of the world. They were a people who asked for little; they had been accustomed for generations to hard living, and it would be difficult to find in all Europe, at all events in Western Europe, a people who were so brave and whose patience was so remarkable under hard conditions of labour. It was quite true that the standard of comfort was rising and that under the influence of America people were less tolerant of hard conditions than they had been in the past, but still, if the Government gave these people but half a chance they were only too willing to remain upon the land. He believed that no greater or more admirable task could be undertaken by the State than the raising of the status of the people in these districts. The conditions of the congested districts was a menace to our civilisation, because it violated that divine law that all mankind were bound together in one brotherhood, and that if one suffered the whole body suffered. Therefore this was not a matter which could be neglected by this country. He did not think that it was a question in regard to which any part of the House would be content to remain inactive, and to allow these people to continue in the condition in which they were. The Government, therefore, in any policy for the improvement of the conditions of these people were sure of the hearty support of the representatives of the Irish people, and so long as they had reason to believe that the Government intended to act honestly in regard to this Commission, that they meant business, that they meant legislation to follow, they could be sure that, so far as the Irish Members were concerned, they would receive their most earnest support. It was sometimes charged against them that they had really no desire to improve the condition of these poor people and remove the evils and poverty from which they suffered. It was suggested that the Irish Members were really averse to improving the material prosperity of their country, and that they were really fishing in troubled waters, and found in the want of prosperity of their country a considerable amount of political capital. Such a suggestion was absolutely baseless. He did not think those who knew how these people lived would have the heart to adopt such a practice. They had a much broader faith in the people than to suppose they would ever be led away by that means.

MR. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.) who was indistinctly heard, said that practically the work of the Congested Districts Board had been in-operative in the South of Ireland. It had been pointed out that there was very little land available for emigration but they had another field in the south—the sea. Useful work had been done as regarded the southern coast line in Father Davis's time, but since then nothing had been done. They could not expect that the necessary assistance would be forthcoming unless there was some change in the Congested Districts Board. Father Davis only survived the creation of the Board by a few years, but during that time he did work that would live long in the memories of the people of the South of Ireland. He asked that a representative for the South of Ireland should be appointed to the Board to make its work effective.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) said he rose not because he thought he could add anything to what had been said as to the misery and suffering of the people of Ireland, but because he desired to point out that this was an English as well as an Irish question. It was not only Ireland that suffered, but England as well, and what surprised him was that Members with Imperial ideas should treat this question with such scant courtesy. Colonial questions interested them; they desired to see the British flag flying in every part of the world, but they did not address themselves to the question of Ireland, where there were 4,000,000 of their own kith and kin who were disgusted by the misgovernment of their country. The debate to-day had been one continued wail of distress. When he first came into the House of Commons in 1892, how full they all were of hope for Ireland. It was to bring deliverance to Ireland that that Parliament was returned. Fourteen years had passed, and how much more forward were they now? Ireland was still more depopulated, and there was the same tale of ruin and woe from the representatives of the Irish people. Was the Parliament of Great Britain so impotent that it was unable to deal with this problem? Much had been done. Many good measures had been passed by the Tory as well as by the Liberal Party, but every inhabitant of Ireland who knew his country said that something more must be done, for the country was going to ruin and decay. He supposed there were not many hon. Members who even knew what a congested district was. They thought it was an overcrowded place like a slum in Salford. The problem in Ireland was due to people having been driven on to land where they could not get a living, whereas the fertile land was denuded of people. The Chief Secretary said that with a view to legislation he must have the support of English public opinion, and that was one of the reasons why he was prepared to appoint this Commission. He would not pretend to criticise the Commission, but he did feel a little in agreement with the hon. Member for South Tyrone when he reminded the House of the number of Commmissions that had already sat. He should have thought that in the archives of the Irish Office there was information enough about the condition of Irish land to have rendered another Commission unnecessary; but he would leave that. What the people of Ireland were asking for to-day was land. To keep them on the land was the problem before Parliament. If it were not for the landlords, and if Parliament had only the Irish people and the land of Ireland to deal with, the problem would be easy of solution. It was only the Clanricardes, the Sligos, the Dillons, and the rest of the landlords who were in the way. They had been told how Lord Dillon had been expropriated by purchase. He had seen some of the tenants on that land, and he had also seen tenants on the De Freyne estate, and whilst the latter tenants were nearly always expecting to be visited by the police owing to friction with their landlords the tenants on the Dillon Estate were as happy and contented as they possibly could be. If the Congested Districts Board were given the powers and facilities which had been suggested he thought that would be a solution of the difficulty. How long were they going to go on in this way? They had a new Parliament and he had every faith in it, and the House was well disposed towards Ireland. They had a Chief Secretary in whom trust had been expressed and he shared that trust. He hoped that the result of this debate in which so many of the troubles of Ireland had been laid bare would be that the germ of hope which they entertained would be brought to fruition.

MR. PAUL (Nottingham) said his only excuse for taking part in this debate was that he was interested by a reference made by the hon. Member for East Mayo to Lord Cowper's Commission. How was that Commission appointed? Owing to a sudden fall of rents five years after the passing of the Land Act of 1881 Mr. Parnell introduced an Irish Land Bill which was rejected in the House of Commons. This was followed by the Plan of Campaign, and that was followed by the Commission over which Lord Cowper presided. He was a Unionist and a great Irish landlord, but he and his Commissioners were so much impressed by the state of things in Ireland that they recommended not only that judicial rents which had been fixed for fifteen years should be revised, but that leaseholders should be brought in under the Act. The Government of that day said through the mouth of Lord Salisbury that that would be not only impolitic but dishonourable. Some Liberal Unionist allies of the Government were not satisfied with that declaration and the Plan of Campaign was exceedingly successful. Before that Commission was over the leaseholders were brought in, and a great improvement was made in the social condition of Ireland. But the Government of that day made that change because they had entire control of the House of Lords. The present Government was exceedingly strong and had a very large majority and he hoped it would be able to do a great deal for Ireland as well as for England. There was, however, one suggestion he would like to make before he sat down, and it was that he hoped this Government, strong as it was, would not give any opportunity to the people of this country or to the people of Ireland, in connection with a Bill which he must not discuss, of saying that the Roman Catholics had to look to another place for protection.

ARMY QUALIFYING EXAMINATION.

THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, I beg to ask His Majesty's Government if they are aware that the next Army qualifying examination is fixed for September 18th, a date which coincides with the termination of the public schools summer holidays, and one that appears to be utterly inconvenient to everyone concerned. This is a most unfortunate time to have an examination, because it would spoil the boys' holidays. It is obvious that boys preparing for an examination could not be away from their work all that time, and the parents would either have to engage tutors during the holidays to work the boys up for the examination or else the boys would have to go to crammers. This would be most unfair to the public schools when they are endeavouring to pass boys direct into the Army and to do away altogether with the undesirable process of cramming. The time fixed for the examination is also one at which the masters as well as the boys are away, and I hope, therefore, that His Majesty's Government will alter the date by at least one month if not two months, so as to enable the boys to continue their work at school when they get back.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of PORTSMOUTH): My Lords, this Question only appeared on the Paper this morning, and I think my noble friend has forgotten that to-day is a holiday in the War Office. I have had no opportunity, therefore, of inquiring into the matter at all, or of communicating with any one upon it. If the noble Earl will postpone his Question until after Monday, I will communicate the answer to him direct, or, if he considers it desirable to put it again in the House, I shall be glad, after looking into the circumstances, to give him a reply

THE EARL OF MAYO: I certainly will not trouble the House by putting the Question again if the answer which the noble Earl communicates to me is satisfactory, but if it is not I must be allowed to raise the matter again.

SOUTH AFRICAN LABOUR.

LORD HARRIS: My Lords, I beg to ask His Majesty's Government whether there is any truth in the rumour that they contemplate reintroducing indiscriminate labour recruiting for the Witwatersrand from Portuguese territory; and to move for Papers. As your Lordships probably know, the recruiting of natives in South Africa for the mines has been undertaken by a body called the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association. The system of that Association has been substituted for one which prevailed before the war, and in a few words I will explain to your Lordships what went on before the Association was formed.

Up to 1889 the demand for labour on the Witwatersrand was not excessive, and although even then the Transvaal natives themselves did not come forward in large numbers, still there was an ample, or more than an ample, supply of labour coming through the East coast ports. That prevailed for some two or three years. The natives paid their own expenses to get to Johannesburg, and the rate of pay was, I believe, 1s. a day. But about 1889 or 1890, the demand for labour suddenly increased, and increased considerably, and the mining companies had to send out men as recruiting agents. These agents were paid a commission per head for each native brought in, as well as their travelling expenses. That went on quite satisfactorily for a few years, until the demand for labour became really severe, and there grew up a system of monstrous tyranny on the part of these labour agents and touts.

These men were carrying on a nefarious trade with natives on their way to the Witwatersrand, and to such an extent was this done, that the mining companies were very heavily mulcted in order to get the labour they required. The fees to the agents rose to as much as £4 and £4 15s. 0d. per head, and the travelling expenses also increased. At the same time the wages of the boys themselves very nearly doubled. The iniquities committed were really serious. In order to prevent this practice by the touts of waylaying natives who were on their way to the mines the Pass Law was adopted by the Boer Government, but it was so inefficiently administered that natives were unable to get the passes which they should have had, and were punished for not having them. Then the war came, and large numbers of natives left the Transvaal. Whilst the war was going on the mining companies decided to form an association to put a stop to the depredations of these labour touts and to improve the conditions under which the natives were recruited and passed from the frontier to Johannesburg. It was principally for this reason that the association was formed.

The association is practically a company, but one which distributes no profits. It is really a co-operative society for the purpose of obtaining labour in the most legitimate way, and its work is carried on under circumstances which should be open to inspection by Government and should be of the best possible character. That is the system which prevails now, but there is a rumour, which is supported by cabled information from Johannesburg, that His Majesty's Government contemplate making a change and setting up competition by giving licences to other persons to recruit. Your Lordships will understand that about 6) per cent. or more of the Kaffir labour on the mines comes from Portuguese territory, and it is there that the principal servants of the association are employed. These are men well known in South Africa, and of the highest respectability. Of course, a certain number of those persons who were engaged in obtaining labour before the war did not get employment under the association. There are, therefore, a number of men in South Africa who are indignant at having lost their occupation, and are jealous of the association.

Any stone is good enough to throw at the mining companies just now, encouraged as these people have been by some Members of His Majesty's Government; and one of the points of attack during the last few months has been the system of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association. It has been declared that their system is ineffective, and that the mining houses deliberately avoid getting as much native labour as is possible in order to bolster up the Chinese importation. Whatever faults may have been attributed to the mining companies, it is never suggested that they are not astute persons. They would be extremely foolish if they did not get as much Kaffir labour as possible, because it is cheaper than Chinese labour, and it is the fact that at this moment there are crushing mines which cannot get as much labour as they could wish.

The form of attack on the association is that they are not recruiting Kaffirs as successfully as they could if they chose, and that it is only necessary to give these licences to other people and thousands of additional Kaffirs will be forthcoming. That has been gone into most carefully on the spot by the secretary of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association, who himself was a Government servant at one time, and he has shown most successfully in an elaborate report that these promises are quite fallacious. It was demonstrated before the Native Labour Commission by the same gentleman that promises of producing Kaffir labour which had been made by various people were, when put to the test, not fulfilled.

The point upon which I lay stress is this. The result of the introduction of this system has been a vast improvement to the Kaffirs themselves. Under the old system, anybody who could get a licence was empowered to go across country, pick up natives and bring them to the Witwatersrand, regardless of their comfort during the journey. All that has been changed. Every Kaffir recruited in Portuguese East Africa has to be brought to one place, where he is medically inspected to make sure that he is fit for the trying climate, where he is informed by a Government official of the conditions of service, and where he is supplied with blankets so that his journey up to the higher altitudes may be made in reasonable comfort. All these beneficial changes have been brought about by the system of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association, and I do deprecate most strongly, without His Majesty's Government being advised from the other side to the contrary, any idea that may be lurking in their minds of setting up competition in this matter. The association will not suffer by it; it is too strong; but the person who I am afraid will suffer is the Kaffir, who will run the risk of being tempted away by men who are not as reliable, not as responsible, and not as respectable as the officers of the association, and who may mislead him by promises which may not be fulfilled.

I should be glad if the noble Earl could tell us what are the intentions of His Majesty's Government in regard to this matter. If they are not prepared to accept the responsibility of deciding upon the question of Chinese labour, why are they taking upon themselves the responsibility of deciding upon a question of this kind? The people on the spot are just as good judges of what they require in this matter as on the Chinese question. In a speech which the noble Earl made the other day he advocated the policy of trusting the man on the spot. I should like to know whether Lord Selborne has reported upon the question of the efficiency of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association, and whether he advises the setting up of licencees to compete with the association. I should be glad to know whether he has consulted a very eminent Portuguese official, lately the Governor-General in Portuguese East Africa and now the Minister for the Colonies at Lisbon, who has an intimate knowledge of what is best for Portuguese East Africa, and who, I am told, has the very strongest objection to recruiting being handed over to any one but a strong association recognised by the Government, and whose operations are, so to speak, inspected by Government. I hope the noble Earl will be able to give satisfactory answers to these questions. I can assure him that this is a serious matter, and I trust that if any papers have been received upon the subject he will consent to lay them on the Table.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of ELGIN): My Lords, to the Question of my noble friend as it appears on the Paper, I think the briefest and most accurate answer would be a simple negative. His Majesty's Government do not contemplate reintroducing indiscriminate labour recruiting for the Witwatersrand from Portuguese territory, and therefore I do not think it is necessary for me to comment upon, or add anything to, the description which the noble Lord has given of what took place before the war under the system he condemns. I might just say that, so far as His Majesty's Government are concerned, their policy would essentially be directed to the improvement of the condition of the natives, and to safeguarding their rights, and would certainly not revert to practices such as the noble Lord has described.

The noble Lord has told us of the origin of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association and how they came to take up the recruiting of native labour for the mines. He described the association very appropriately as a co-operative society. I venture to think that a very good description because the whole essence of its position was that it represented the mine owners and those interested in the working of the mines for which this labour was recruited. It it is essentially a voluntary association. It does not depend on any official sanction; it was the deliberate action of the mine owners themselves to combine for this object. I am not prepared to deny that having a single agency for a purpose of this kind has considerable advantages. But all depends on the association having at its back the force by which it was originated; and if it is found that there are substantial interests connected with the mines of the same nature as those for which the association was formed, or that some of those who took part in the formation of the association are not satisfied with the state of things as they now exist, then the position of this co-operative or voluntary society becomes considerably modified.

I was rather surprised that the noble Lord made no reference to an answer which was given on behalf of His Majesty's Government ten days ago in another place,† and as it very precisely defined the position we take up, I would ask your Lordships to allow me to read it. The question was—

> "Whether the Government are aware that the sole right to recruit Kaffirs is enjoyed by the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association; whether they are prepared to put an end to this monopoly; and whether they will throw open recruiting of Kaffirs to other responsible persons or bodies."

The Answer given by the Under-Secretary was—

> "The Witwatersrand Native Labour Association is a voluntary union of all or most of the principal mineowners to regularise and control the recruiting of native labourers for the mines——"

*LORD HARRIS: My information is that all the mining groups are in co-operation.

*THE EARL OF ELGIN: I am quite willing to take it that they were at one time.

*LORD HARRIS: They are now.

*THE EARL OF ELGIN: The reply given on behalf of the Government proceeded—

> "It occupies a commanding position so far as recruiting in British South Africa is concerned, and enjoys a practical monopoly in respect of British Central Africa and Portuguese East Africa. Although this arrangement constitutes a great improvement upon the 'free recruiting' system which it has replaced, it is not itself without serious disadvantages. His Majesty's Government are not unwilling to permit recruiting on equal terms by other bodies; but their status, substance, and responsibility must be clearly established beforehand in each particular case, in order that there may be no risk of the natives being deceived by extravagant promises or ill-used on their way to the mines."

I hope your Lordships will understand from that answer that there is no intention of considering recruiting by agents who may have lost their occupation in consequence of the changes that have taken place since the war. What is in contemplation is to meet the objection of substantial mining interests which are not contented with the association, and do not consider it, as the noble Lord does, as representative of the whole of those interests.

I would remind your Lordships that this question of recruiting in Portuguese East Africa depends on an Agreement which was concluded between Lord Milner as High Commissioner and the Governor-General of Mozambique in December, 1901. In the second Article of that Agreement it is laid down that the collectors of labour are to be accepted by both parties, and I maintain that in the Answer which I have read, that provision is provided for, and that an inquiry into the status, substance, and responsibility of the persons who apply for permission to recruit does carry out on our side the conditions of that Article.

For the rest the matter remains with the Portuguese Government. It is for the Portuguese Governor-General, and for him alone, to give permits for recruiters. Under these circumstances we have had to consider the necessity of communications, not only with the High Commissioner, as the noble Lord suggested, but also possibly with the Portuguese authorities. Those communications are still proceeding, and I am therefore not in a position to give a final and definite answer as to what may be the outcome. Nor am I able to say with precision what Papers I shall be able to lay upon the Table of the House, but I can assure the noble Lord that His Majesty's Government have nothing to conceal in this matter. They are simply working out the policy described in the answer given in the other House, and which I have quoted. I shall be quite prepared, when the time comes, to give your Lordships any Papers in connection with this subject that I can reasonably be expected to produce.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Dismissal of Irish National School Teachers.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of Irish national school teachers who have been dismissed by order of the Board for inefficiency, degraded from the position of principal to that of assistant on the same allegation, or forced to retire on small pensions when within five years of their maximum service, during each of the last ten years, with average number of years served in each case.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education have furnished me with the following statement:—

Year.	Teachers dismissed for inefficiency.	Teachers degraded from position of principal teacher, but not dismissed.	Teachers from whom salary was withdrawn within five years of their maximum service.
1896 - - -	Nil.	Nil	Nil
1897 - - -	6	Nil	1
1898 - - -	16	Nil	1
1899 - - -	24	6	6
1902 - - -	26	1	6
1903 - - -	41	5	17
1904 - - -	61	3	24
1905 - - -	49	2	7

The average service of the teachers included in the last column was thirty-seven years.

Rateable Value and Income-Tax on Bass's, Allsopp's, and Guinness's Brewery.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the rateable valuation of Bass and Company's brewery at Burton is £43,771, Allsopp's in same town £28,673, and Guinness's brewery, Dublin, £12,000; will he say if income-tax is charged upon these valuations as well as local rates and taxes; and can he say at what date the Commissioner of Valuation will be in a position to commence the revaluation of the City of Dublin.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The information, on which I was able to reply to the hon. Member's Question on the 14th instant † respecting Messrs. Bass's breweries, was supplied by the secretary of the company, who courteously informed the Commissioner of Valuation (Ireland) that the net rateable value of their three breweries was £22,150. I understand that the figure quoted by the hon. Member includes stores and other buildings besides the breweries. The figure given for Messrs. Alsopp's breweries is, I believe, approximately correct, if the other buildings are included. The amount, £22,000, stated by me to be the valuation of Messrs. Guinness's breweries was taken from this year's valuation lists. The revenue is not affected by the amount of the valuation, inasmuch as the annual value on which property tax is paid is allowed as a deduction in computing the profits of the business for assessment under Schedule D. The Commissioner of Valuation informs me that he expects to begin the revaluation of Dublin within the next two months.

Transportation of Unemployed to the Colonies.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state how many adult males have recently been sent to New Zealand by unemployed committees receiving aid from rates or public taxes, and how many sent elsewhere across the seas.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) Up to May 31st last, the Central (Unemployed) Body for London had sent 350 adult males to the Colonies, viz. 41 to New Zealand and 309 to Canada. The Returns from the Distress Committees outside London show that, up to March 31st last, they had sent 152 adult males to the Colonies, all of whom went to Canada. The later figures have not yet been received.

Report of Motor Cars Commission.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): To ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Report of the Royal Commission on Motor Cars may be expected.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have made inquiry on this subject, and I have every reason to believe that the Report will shortly be presented.

Outbreak of Ophthalmia at Rugby.

MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the frequent recurrence of cases of ophthalmia, conjunctivis impetigo, and other preventible diseases at the public school at Rugby during some years past; and whether, by holding an inquiry or otherwise, he will take steps to prevent danger to the public health by the spread of these disorders, usually arising from bad sanitary arrangements.

(Anwered by Mr. John Burns.) I was not aware of the outbreaks referred to. I will communicate with the urban district council on the subject.

Increase of Rates between Newhaven and Dieppe.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company have for several years past charged more than their legal maximum fares for passengers from London or Newhaven to Dieppe, and that their Bill of this year, which has passed this House, allows of an increase in the legal maximum; and whether the Board made any Report upon the Bill as regards these facts.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Board of Trade have recently pointed out to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company that the fares they are charging to passengers from Newhaven to Dieppe, and to third class passengers from London to Dieppe, appear to be in excess of their powers, and the Company is putting reduced fares into operation on the 1st proximo. The Company's Bill of this Session contains a proposal to increase the maximum fares authorised on the steam vessels between Newhaven and Dieppe. No Report from the Department on this proposal appears to be required by Standing Orders, but the Board communicated with the Company, who agreed to make a reduction in the maximum fares proposed for second and third class passengers. The new maxima will be 12s. 6d. and 8s. 6d., in place of 13s. and 10s. respectively, as originally proposed, and the Company have undertaken to amend the Bill accordingly.

Board of Education Library Catalogue.

MR. THOMASSON (Leicester): To ask the President of the Board of Education, whether, in view of the current controversy upon education, and the complexity of the whole subject, he will arrange for a printed catalogue of the library of the Board of Education at St. Stephen's House to be prepared and made available at the earliest possible time for the use of the general public.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The question of a catalogue of the Board of Education Library has, I know, been under consideration; but as the hon. Member's Question is only put upon the Paper to-day, and the library and office of the Board are closed to-day, being His Majesty's Birthday, I am unable to obtain the requisite information for giving an adequate Answer to the Question. If he will put it on the Paper again this day week I will endeavour to furnish a considered reply.

Orange Processions at Carrickmore.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware that it has been announced that a body of Orangemen, with bands and banners, are to parade the streets of Carrickmore, county Tyrone, on the coming July 12th, and that their coming is viewed with resentment; is he aware that the district is overwhelmingly Catholic, and that the presence on such a day of men with Orange emblems, and bands playing party tunes, is calculated to create ill feeling and likely to incite to riot; and whether, seeing that the late Government refused to allow Catholic processionists to march through Protestant strongholds and vice versa, will he take steps to forbid the intended procession to take place.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The matter in question is being inquired into. The necessary steps for the preservation of the peace will be taken, but I am not at present in a position to make a statement as to the particular steps which may be necessary. It is much to be desired that both parties would agree to desist simultaneously from the practice of marching with party emblems and bands playing party tunes, a practice which has frequently caused breaches of the peace.

ELECTIONS (MEETINGS IN SCHOOLROOMS) BILL [LORDS.]

LAND TENURE BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee), further considered.

SIR FREDERICK BANBURY (City of London) said that in his speech on the previous Friday he had pointed out that the principal defect of Sub-section 1 of Clause 1 was that it left out a line which appeared in a similar section of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900, which in his opinion constituted a safeguard, namely "of the inherent capabilities of the soil." He admitted on that occasion that there were many hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House who believed their object would be obtained by leaving out those words "the inherent capabilities of the soil." The reason they objected to the words being inserted was that should there be any dispute it would be very difficult to ascertain what improvements were due to the inherent capabilities of the soil, and what to some other reason. It was, he admitted, difficult to find out what had been produced by the inherent capabilities of the soil, and what had been produced by better work on the part of the farmer, and he agreed that nothing that could give facilities to the members of the legal profession for earning money should be put into an Act of Parliament. But the thing must tell the other way, and the effect of leaving these words out would be what very frequently happened now, namely, that a farmer would take a farm in first-class condition, hold it for three years, take all he could out of it and go away. In one particular case in which he was interested the man went bankrupt and they ascertained that he never had any capital, and he had been living in that way for the previous ten years. In regard to these words the landlords were willing to come to a compromise and not engage in litigation, because they knew it was difficult to say what was due to the inherent capabilities of the soil, and the same would apply to the farmer who must know perfectly well that though the improvements were the result of his work and not due to the inherent capabilities of the soil there would be difficulty in proving it, and there would be a risk of litigation. He proposed to add at the end of the sub-section words which would re-insert the words of the Act of 1900—the words "inherent capabilities of the soil." If this sub-section was retained that would insure the purpose he had in view, and he was quite content to achieve his object in that way. Meanwhile he moved the omission of the sub-section.

MR. GARDNER (Berkshire, Wokingham) expressed the opinion that this was a most unfair clause so far as the landlord was concerned. It was quite possible for a farmer who knew the land to estimate what the inherent capabilities of the soil were. It was not right that anyone should be allowed to claim a right to the inherent capabilities of the soil, and if they were to be transferred at all they should be transferred for the benefit of the general public. Supposing a farm was let to be cultivated in the manner in which it had been cultivated for generations. As time went on, the tenant might find that the land would be of greater value if cultivated in a different manner. In such a case surely a tenant ought to have the right to cultivate the land in the best way. He thought these words ought not to be left out, they were easily definable and easily adjusted between a man and his tenant.

"In page 1, line 10, to leave out Sub-section (1) of Clause 1."—(Sir Frederick Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, to the end of page 1, line 17, stand part of the Bill."

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) said he could not quite understand why the hon. Baronet had moved to leave out this sub-section. With regard to the question of the inherent capabilities of the soil he thought the discussion now taking place was a belated one when they considered what took place during the passage of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900. Sir Charles Welby then moved an Amendment with a similar object, but the Government of the day, and the then President of the Board of Agriculture, the right hon. Member for South Dublin, absolutely refused to consider that injustice would be done to the landlord, or to accept the Amendment, and he retained the Bill in the shape it was introduced in the House of Commons. It was quite true that in another place these words were put in, but, in the opinion of the then Government, they were absolutely unnecessary and uncalled for. That was not only the opinion of the Government, but also of Captain Pretyman, who farmed some thousands of acres himself, his view being that they would not affect compensation one way or the other, that the putting in of the words "the inherent capabilities of the soil" would only confuse the minds of the valuers, and that, speaking from a practical standpoint, the words should be omitted. Although not a great landlord like Captain Pretyman, he himself had had some practical experience in these matters, and he agreed with every word uttered by Captain Pretyman in 1900 on this question. Valuers held the same view, and the Central Chamber of Agriculture had emphatically declared against the words "inherent capabilities of the soil" being again introduced. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed because it was undesirable to re-argue a matter which had been definitely decided in 1900.

*MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said it appeared to him that the hon. Baronet had found himself in a strange and difficult position. He now urged that to insert these words would confuse the minds of the valuers, but the hon. Baronet was somewhat stultifying some previous Acts of his own, because he was one of the promoters of the Scottish Agricultural Holdings Bill which had the whole weight of the late Board of Agriculture behind it.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY said that was purely a Consolidation Bill, not amending but simply codifying existing law.

*MR. COCHRANE said that was an extraordinarily specious argument, but it would not do. The fact of the matter was the hon. Gentleman was in a difficulty. Another name on the back of the Scottish Agricultural Holdings Bill was that of the hon. and learned Attorney-General for Scotland, and if he had for a moment thought that these words bore the interpretation placed upon them by the hon. Gentleman who sat next him, he would not have permitted them to come into any Bill having his name on the back. The real fact was that the hon. Gentleman had been rushed by the private Members behind the Bill. Without consulting the Board of Agriculture they had introduced a hotch-potch Bill dealing with the Game and other laws affecting the agricultural interests, and upsetting the law which had existed for many years, without adequate consideration. The hon. Gentleman had either to bring his own knowledge to bear against that of the promoters of the Bill and to state what was his mind and what was that of the Department he represented, or he had to make some specious excuse in order to accept the point of view of the promoters. He thought his hon. friend, in moving the rejection of this sub-section was perfectly logical and in order. There were only two logical courses to take, either to leave out the whole of the sub-section or so to amend it as to bear out the law which they intended to pass. He thought the best solution of the difficulty was to accept the suggestion of his hon. friend and to leave it out.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. URE, Linlithgowshire) said he did not think that anyone in the House who had the slightest familiarily with the question of the rights of the tenants would support this Amendment. To Scotsmen, at all events, it was sufficient to say in the words of the most eminent authority that they had on this branch of the law—

> "No man can claim for an improvement effected by him what is due to the inherent capabilities of the soil, and in practice the Court has never been asked to deal with such a preposterous claim."

Although that authority might not appeal with great force to English Members, he thought it would certainly carry some weight. He thought the Amendment would afford the landlord no protection whatever and might have the effect of creating some injustice.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) said he rose not for the purpose of urging the acceptance of this Amendment, but merely for the purpose of calling attention to the drafting of the sub-section. He had had some experience of trying to make out the meaning of sub-sections of Acts of Parliament from time to time, and this was one of the most extraordinary he had ever read. It spoke of "the first schedule to this Act," but it appeared on examination that it did not mean this Act, but another Act, the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883. Then, too, he found that the first section of the Act of 1883 was repealed by the first section of the Act of 1900, and now the first section of the Act of 1900 was being repealed by this Bill, and when the first section of the Act of 1900 which repealed the first section of the Act of 1883 was repealed by the first section of this Bill, then he wanted to know what became of the first section of the Act of 1883. He would put another conundrum. How were the improvements to be dealt with which were made before this Act, but not before the principal Act of 1883? They repealed this section, but at the same time said it was to be subject to the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 which was called the principal Act. He found in the Act of 1883 very elaborate provisions as to what was to be the commencement of the Act in relation to improvements of ten years before. Did the present Bill deal only with improvements made after it should come into operation or with improvements made before this Act and not before the Act of 1883. These questions did not go to the merit of the Bill but merely to its drafting. He hoped the Government would put their draftsman on the Bill for a few hours, so that the next time it came before the House of Commons it might be in so simple a form that he who ran might read.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said the right hon. Gentleman had succeeded in putting very humorously what were not uncommon difficulties in all legislation by reference. He thought the clause was open to some of the objections to legislation by reference, but that it was on the whole simpler than most cases where this course was adopted.

SIR E. CARSON: No wonder we grow rich!

SIR W. ROBSON said what the clause did was to repeal and re-enact and that was precisely the method which was adopted by those who objected to legislation by reference. That was what this clause did, and thus it gave rise to the apparent absurdities to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred. The Act of 1900 was not repealed entirely. What was desired was to make an alteration in sub-section (1) of that Act, and therefore, sub-section (1) was repealed and another sub-section substituted for it in this Bill. This was a measure in which in future would be read the Act of 1900 with the Amendments in this Bill. The references to the Act of 1883 in the section were perfectly proper. The section said that the provisions of this Bill were to be subject not merely to the Act of 1900 but to the principal Act of 1883. He did not think the Government draftsman would be able to make a better job of the Bill unless the expedient of a consolidating and codifying Act were adopted. That course, however, could not be pursued in every case if time were to be economised.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said he had no wish to lose himself in the mazes of the law. So far as he knew, the difficulties alluded to by the Solicitor-General and other legal Members might not be apparent to laymen such as himself. But the laymen, who were generally the owners of the property in such cases as they were now discussing, if they were not aware of the difficulties, were painfully aware of the injustice inflicted by this Bill. The Solicitor-General for Scotland had made perfectly plain the difficulty into which they had been landed by making this Bill apply to both England and Scotland. He did not wish to argue the question of the inherent capabilities of the soil. He would take the case of land near a large town, which for years had been farmed by the tenant under the ordinary system of rotation of crops. As the town increased in size the tenant discovered that a fortune might be made by growing vegetables or fruit. In his opinion it was most unfair that the whole characteristics of the farm should be altered without the consent of the landlord. The landlord knew what the soil was capable of producing, and he might be in a position to advise his tenant that he would be wrong if he tried to establish a market garden upon certain land. If the tenant went on with his plan against the advice of his landlord, was it right in case he did not succeed that he should charge his landlord with a large amount as compensation when the whole of the money had been laid out against the landlord's advice and knowledge? Such a proceeding would be grossly unfair, because the owner or his agent was much better acquainted with the capabilities of the soil than the tenant. He should therefore support the Amendment.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said he listened with astonishment to the Solicitor-General's defence of the draftsmanship of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman unfortunately would not be available to assist the unlucky agriculturists all over the country who if this Bill passed would be called on to try and understand its terms. Although he was familiar with the Acts of 1883 and 1900 it took him some time to understand what was the intention of the promoters of the present Bill. The whole object of the sub-section was to get rid of the words, "the inherent capability of the soil," and his hon. friends desired that they should be retained. What the promoters of the Bill had lost sight of was that in 1900 the opinion he held, and which he gave expression to, as to the accurate description of the effect of these words was not shared by a great many other Members, who resisted his suggestion and held that the excision of these words from the Statute would have a serious effect. The result was that the words were inserted in another place, and the Amendment accepted when the Bill came back to this House. During the six years that had passed there had not been one single instance where the retention of the words had caused either doubt or difficulty, and he submitted that the experience of those six years justified the action taken by his hon. friends. Their view was shared by many practical agriculturists in and out of the House. His view in 1900 was what it was now, namely, that whether these words were inserted or not no practical valuer who was called upon to deal with valuations of agricultural improvements effected by tenants could by any possibility exclude from his purview what was due for the cultivation of the soil according to the agreement of the tenant. Two distinct operations were performed by the tenant. He took his farm under an agreement which imposed certain obligations, one of which was to pursue a system of good husbandry or a system in accordance with the custom of the district, and in return the tenant got the land for a particular rent. It was the custom of the tenant to spend a certain amount of money upon improvements, but the mere farming of the land was a part of the condition upon which the tenant farmer received the farm at a particular rent. If the tenant did not enter into that undertaking the question of rent would at once have been materially altered. If the tenant was a good farmer he would go beyond his agreement, speculate and put capital into his farm, often with beneficial results. There were many farmers possessing intelligence, industry and foresight, who spent money upon the land from which no good result had followed and for which the tenant had no claim at all for compensation. Therefore he believed the promoters of the Bill would do well not to lay so much importance on the retention of the words, or to embark in such complicated legislation for so small a result.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) reminded the House that during the discussion on the Bill of 1883, introduced by a Liberal Government, the late Lord Herschell most emphatically endorsed those words as words that should be in the Bill, and that opinion was corroborated by the united opinion of those responsible for the introduction of that measure. When they were asked to consider this Bill as merely a re-echo of the Bill of 1900 he had a right to remind the Liberal Party of what was the opinion of their chief lawyer when the subject first came under the consideration of Parliament. As regarded this particular Amendment he had no very strong feeling. He quite realised that valuers probably did not take into account the inherent capabilities of the soil, but was it not possible that valuers when they saw the provision was taken out might think it was a direct instruction that they should take improvements due to those capabilities into consideration? He thought they should correct the subsection by re-introducing those words, because they were, to a certain extent, a safeguard.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford) said he was afraid that the leaving out of those words might be taken by the valuers in a wrong sense in adjudicating upon what was really the property of the owner of the soil. He was one of those who had never been able to understand why people should have any difficulty in understanding what these words meant. The meaning was perfectly clear. The "inherent capabilities of the soil" was the fertility of the soil which might hitherto have been lying latent. It was the property of the owner of the soil, to secure which possibly he had paid £40, £50, or even £100 per acre. It was the only means by which the owner could secure any return for the capital he laid out in purchasing the land. What was the occupier of the land who made improvements by his skill and labour entitled to? So long as he remained in occupation of the land he enjoyed the results of the improvements he had made, and when his tenancy was determined he was justly entitled to be compensated for the labour and capital which he had expended, and which he had not enjoyed to the full. If they left out the words, "inherent capabilities," it might result in the outgoing tenant receiving compensation out of all proportion to the labour and money which he had expended in bringing the latent fertility to fruition. A clear distinction was drawn years ago by Sir John Lawes, the greatest authority on these questions, between the condition of the land as left and its natural fertility. The outgoing tenant was not entitled to compensation for what Sir John Lawes called the natural fertility of the soil, which in the case of agricultural land was something the owner had paid for. He impressed upon the promoters of the Bill that it would be much more satisfactory, and that it would save a great deal of time if this sub-section were left out altogether. By retaining the words, "inherent capabilities of the soil" they would have been much more likely to secure fair dealing in these matters.

*MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) said he only wanted to add a concrete instance of what might be the probable effect of rejecting this Amendment and retaining the clause as it now stood. His right hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Newport Division of Shropshire had said that the effect of cutting out the words "the inherent capabilities of the soil" from the Statute Book must give the impression to a valuer or arbitrator that the inherent capabilities of the soil were intended by this House to be the property of the tenant. He would take a case which frequently happened. A farmer rented some land at say £1 an acre. Part of it he decided to turn, with the permission of the landlord, into a market garden. He expended £50 an acre in so doing, and it would not be at all improbable that he would increase the annual value of the land to as much as £7, £8, or £10 an acre. When he went he would be entitled to compensation at the rate of twenty or twenty-five years purchase on the increase. Working that out on ten acres he would get compensation under this section amounting to £1,500, whereas his total expenditure on the land was only £500. That would almost certainly occur if these words were deliberately cut out of the Statute. He hoped the promoters of the Bill would see their way to cut out the sub-section. He should not have stood out much for putting in the words "inherent capabilities of the soil" if they were not on the Statute-book already, but as they were there they ought to keep them there.

Mr. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) moved that the Question be now put.

*__Mr. SPEAKER__: I think the House is now prepared to come to a decision on the Amendment.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Frederick Banbury and Viscount Turnour.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY moved to add to the end of sub-section (1) the words, "desirous of farming in accordance with the custom of the country." He thought he could make clear to the House that there was substance and reason in his Amendment. He would support it by a reference to a case which occurred on his own estate. As the clause stood compensation might be awarded to the outgoing tenant for improvements he had made to such amount as fairly represented the value of the improvments to the incoming tenant. It was quite conceivable that a specialised tenant, farming on particular lines, might have effected improvements which would be useless to another tenant who farmed according to the ordinary conditions of husbandry. In fact, instead of improvements, they might be to the incoming tenant a detriment. He wanted to argue that it was impossible in fairness and equity to say that where a tenancy was determined, the landlord in order to get a new tenant should ask for a tenant who would carry on the same system of farming as had been carried on by the outgoing tenant. In his own experience a tenant had gone in for the breeding of thoroughbred racing stock, and the long rows of loose boxes for the reception of stallions and brood mares were of little or no use to the incoming tenant who wished to farm according to the ordinary custom of that part of the country. The sum to be paid as compensation to the outgoing tenant for improvements was fixed by arbitration at approximately £1,500. But he was not particularly anxious to find another tenant who would devote himself to the same line of business, and the land reverted under the new tenant to the ordinary agricultural system of the district. He found, however, that it would be unfair to charge the new tenant a larger sum than £500 for the advantages of the specialised improvements made by the outgoing tenant, and so he practically lost £1,000. Hon. Gentlemen who were really desirous of maintaining and benefiting the system of agriculture which went to increase the fertility of the soil and increase the employment of labour on the land must not expose landowners to the danger of having to deal with this exceptional, specialised kind of farming, but should look at the question from the point of view of the general interests of agriculture and of the country as a whole. Broadly speaking, the farmers of a district were pretty good judges as to how to use their land, and if there had been established a general custom of farming in a particular district, it might be taken for granted that that was the right system. He believed he had established a case for his Amendment, and he hoped it would be accepted in the interest of fair play, of good agriculture, and of supporting the general level of agriculture, and not sacrificing the general level to certain exceptional kinds of farming. The Amendment was perfectly simple. There was no catch about it. It simply ensured that if a farm was vacated it should be farmed in accordance with the custom prevailing in the district.

Lord TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham) seconded the Amendment, which he thought was worthy of the consideration of the promoters.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 21, after the word 'tenant,' to insert the words 'desirous of farming in accordance with the custom of the county.'"—(Col. Kenyon-Slaney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. SOARES sincerely hoped that they might not have a long debate on this Amendment. The landlord was protected under the Bill, because it provided that there should be paid such sum as fairly represented the value of the improvement to the incoming tenant. If the words of the right hon. Gentleman were added, either they would be unnecessary or they would impose a further restriction upon the tenant farmer. It was perfectly obvious that in the interest of the tenant farmer they could not accept the Amendment, which would hamper him.

Mr. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.) thought the Amendment deserved more consideration than had been given to it. The compensation to be given appeared to be that which would be given to a hypothetical tenant.

Mr. BRACE (Glamorganshire, S.) trusted that the Amendment would not be accepted. He looked upon it as a species of obstruction, and as being made to render it impossible to pass the Bill into law in the present session. As he understood it, the proposal was that unless the farm was farmed in accordance with the custom of the district, the tenant would not have the advantage of the improvement which he had made. If there was one industry more than another which had suffered from the want of development through invention it was agriculture. He was not a tenant farmer himself; nor on the other hand had he any interest in wringing out of the tenant farmer anything which fairly belonged to him. ["Who is?"] He did not want to be led into the discussion of a side issue, and although he was not a tenant farmer himself he had some common sense, and was entitled to argue on behalf of those he represented. Because agriculture had not been allowed to make full use of the inventive genius of the race it had suffered. If the Amendment were adopted it would be impossible for a tenant farmer, no matter how able or desirous, to strike out a line for himself without endangering his right to compensation.

LORD HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) protested against they charge which had been made. The position was a most extraordinary one. A Bill dealing with the most important industry in the country had been brought in by young private Members. They had had only two days discussion, and then when an important Amendment was brought forward they were accused of obstruction in order to defeat the measure and to wring further money out of tenants. It had not been the practice of landlords of this country to wring money out of tenants. When the hon. Member talked about inventive genius he would point out to him the many elaborate machines which were now used in agriculture which he must have seen in his perambulations through his constituency. They objected to giving compensation for something which might be of no good at all as the Bill proposed, and the money paid for which for the purposes of the incoming tenant might as well be thrown into the sea.

*MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) recognised that the Amendment was moved to meet what might be a genuine grievance under the Bill. To take the extreme case of a stud farm, given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Newport Division, it would no doubt be difficult to find an incoming tenant to whom the alterations made would be of value. The cases taken, however, were extreme and exceptional, and would come under the existing law. The words of the Amendment might, moreover, militate against enterprise and industry. For these reasons he felt great difficulty in supporting the Amendment, though he recognised the motives underlying it. He thought it would come better in Clause 7, where he had put down an Amendment of a similar character so as to allow full liberty for the enterprise of the tenant while maintaining the characteristics of the holding. He would like to see a farmer have full liberty to make what improvements he liked, but at the same time he thought it would be hard for a man who let a farm for one purpose to have returned to him at the end of the tenancy a farm of quite a different character. Therefore, although he could not support this Amendment, he believed it was moved with the idea of meeting a real difficulty. The Bill went much farther than any previous Act and was promoted in favour of a particular class connected with the industry, and that being so, the House ought to look to all the classes concerned in that industry. Their interests were more or less indentical, whether they were landlords, future tenants, or sitting tenants, and they centred in the better cultivation of the land.

*SIR H. AUBREY-FLETCHER said he rose to support the Amendment of his hon. friend, but he doubted whether he should have intervened at all had it not been for the speech of the hon. Member for South Glamorgan, who represented that portion of Glamorgan in which he himself was a considerable landed proprietor. He had brought a charge against the landlord party and his hon. friend of endeavouring to wring money out of the occupying tenants. He would only deal with the county of Glamorgan. He thought he ought to do so in justice to the tenantry who occupied lands on the Aubrey Estate in Glamorgan. He did not claim to have one thousand agricultural tenants on his property, which consisted of 8,000 or 9,000 acres in the hon. Member's constituency, but he had a considerable number. He did not think that in any portion of Glamorgan there was any wish among agricultural tenants for a change in the tenure on which they now held. He would remind the House that some years ago there was a land agitation and a Land Commission in South Wales, but no portion of the tenants in Glamorgan would have anything to do with the agitation, because they were satisfied with the terms of their agreements. The Amendment of his hon. friend provided that the farm should be carried on in accordance with the custom of the country. In the portion of the country to which he alluded the custom was very simple and he did not think the tenants had any wish to alter it. They were thriving and industrious, and they were enabled by their industry to pay their rents with great promptitude. He was sure they had no wish for any change. He thought he was justified on behalf of his friends who were large landowners in the county of Glamorgan in repudiating what the hon. Member had said with regard to tenants having money wrung out of them. He did not wish to go into personal matters and would merely say that in fifteen years he had spent some £20,000 for the benefit of the tenancies.

Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) said that in Committee this clause was discussed fully, and with a singular amount of freedom, and he did not think that either those who represented the landlords or those who represented the tenants very strongly opposed the clause. In his opinion it was not wise in the interests of agriculture that tenants should be tied up too tightly by their agreements. He thought they needed to have some freedom and initiative as regarded the cultivation of the land. The purposes for which the farm was to be used was very much determined by the character of the buildings and that was a matter which was left to the discretion of the owner by this Bill. [Dissent.] He thought it was, but if it was found when Clause 7 was discussed that the repairs did not mean "repairs" but reconstruction, he would be very glad to join in making it clear that the owner should have full discretion as to the character of the buildings. If he was right, the buildings, fences, roads, and so forth, permanent fixtures, remained in the discretion of the owner, and that was a great security against the whole character of the holding being changed without his consent. Therefore he thought it was not necessary to discuss some of these points at length. It was of course impossible to discuss the clause without having an eye on all the other clauses, but he thought each clause as it came should be discussed on its merits. In his opinion this clause was in the interest of agriculture and should be so regarded.

*Mr. GEORGE FABER (York) felt quite sure that most Members were in favour of a genuine farmer obtaining compensation for genuine improvements that he had made. What they wished to guard against was paying for unnecessary improvements made by what he would call, for want of a better term, a fancy farmer. And this became more apparent when they looked at Clause 7. Under the law as it stood at present the planting of fruit trees did require the consent of the landlord, but under this Bill as drawn that consent was not required. Let him put a case. A tenant of a speculative turn of mind took a farm of 200 acres, and thinking part of it was suitable for fruit farming, laid down at a cost of £60 an acre 20 acres of that farm to fruit. When he left the farm the value of the improvement might be nothing. In fact the landlord might find it difficult to get a tenant who wanted 20 acres of fruit trees on the farm. Was that an improvement for which the landlord ought to pay compensation? Did they not rather desire to encourage genuine improvements of the land of the farm? Looking at the matter from that point of view, he agreed with the Amendment, because he believed it tended in that direction. If the House did not find itself able to accept the Amendment, he agreed with the hon. Member for Durham that the best course would be to change the word "an" to "the," which would have the effect of removing the difficulty of arriving at the value of the improvement. The value of the improvement to "an incoming tenant" was a problematical value, because no tenant might be found, whereas the value to the "incoming tenant" was real. Therefore, if they substituted the word "the" for the word "an" they would shut out and guard against the possibility of the landlord paying for an improvement which might not only be of no use, but possibly be harmful to him.

MR. SOARES rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Soares and Mr. Winfrey.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford) moved to leave out sub-section (2). This sub-section substituted for the procedure laid down in the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900 an entirely new arrangement which made it compulsory in the event of arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act for the reference to be to a single arbitrator. The principal object of the Act of 1900 was to make the procedure under previous Acts more simple and less expensive, and it would be generally admitted by those who had had practical experience that that object had been attained. No doubt the promoters of the present Bill would claim that this sub-section would carry the object further by the substitution of a single arbitrator. How were these arbitrations carried out under present arrangements? The Act of 1900 required that the arbitration, unless the parties otherwise agreed, should be by a single arbitrator, so that either party concerned could, if he liked, insist on having a single arbitrator. He believed agriculturists very much preferred that that arrangement should continue, and he ventured to think there were very good grounds for holding that view. He was sorry the representative of the Board of Agriculture was not at the moment in the House, because hon. Gentlemen would remember that only a short time ago the hon. Baronet referred to the representative character of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and said that anything the Chamber expressed should have great weight. When this particular matter came up for discussion at the Central Chamber of Agriculture, a Resolution was carried nem. con. objecting to this sub-section. The present arrangement was considered to be satisfactory, but in the case of a single arbitrator each party must have a representative or advocate to present his case to the arbitrator. The landlord probably had his agent who might or might not be a gentleman learned in the law, and it was absolutely necessary for the outgoing tenant who was the other party to have some expert gentleman to advise him and get up his case. In other words, there would be three experts engaged on the work. Where, however, each party appointed an arbitrator, a third person was only called in as umpire in any matter on which the arbitrators could not agree. The result was that in a great many cases the umpire was never called in, and therefore only two experts had to be paid for instead of three, as would always be the case if the system of a single arbitrator were made compulsory. One of the most experienced valuers in the country had written stating his agreement with the view which he was now putting forward. A preponderating number of farmers' associations in the country had expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with the present arrangement, and against their freedom of action being taken away by its being made compulsory for a single arbitrator to be appointed in each case. He therefore moved the omission of this sub-section.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) seconded the Motion, because he thought this was one of those questions in which it was very desirable the House should see that this Bill was in accordance with the opinion of those interested, and also in accordance with true economy. On neither of those grounds did he think any defence could be made for the retention of this sub-section. So far as the opinion of the tenants themselves was concerned, and putting aside the question of the landlords, who, he was afraid, were not often mentioned in debates on this Bill, he would point out that his hon. friend had given a good deal of evidence against this proposal, and they might justly ask the promoters of this Bill to bring forward proof that the tenants were desirous of obtaining this sub-section. So far as he had been able to ascertain an opinion—and it was very much confirmed by the reports that had come to the Central Chamber of Agriculture from farmers' clubs—the tenants did not look upon this provision with either enthusiasm or interest, but, in fact, they very much preferred the present system. That being so, they ought to have very strong proof that the system proposed to be substituted was a better one before making the change. As to the question of economy, he had not been able to ascertain any views to show that this proposal would effect economy. First of all the single arbitrator would have to be quite a different type of person to the arbitrators at present appointed. He would have to be appointed more or less officially, and he would become something in the nature of a County Court Judge, a man set apart who would have to be paid either out of rates or taxes. Before him would appear the experts who would represent the landlord and the tenant. There was very little prospect in a country district of one man being mutually appointed by landlord and tenant to decide on these questions. Each party in almost every case liked to have his own view put forward. As a rule mutual compromise came in, and the result was very easy to arrive at without much expense under the present system. The establishments of a sort of court, on the other hand, might lead to further persons being introduced into the proceedings, because instead of his agent being employed the landlord very probably would have a legal gentleman to advise. Instead, therefore , of simplicity and economy it would mean the establishment of a land court and an increase of expenditure.

"In page 1, line 22, to leave out sub-section (2) of Clause 1."—(Mr. Abel Smith.)

Question proposed: "That the words proposed to be left out, to 'contract' in page 1, line 24, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. SOARES sincerely hoped that the gloomy forebodings of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down would not be realised. The whole sub-section was really a very simple one; it raised only one small question and that was the appointment of a single arbitrator in all cases. He might point out that sub-section (5) of Clause 2 of the Act of 1900 provided that an arbitration should, unless the parties otherwise agreed, be before a single arbitrator. All that this sub-section did was to omit the words "unless the parties otherwise agree." Already it was conceded that a single arbitrator, whenever possible, was advisable. He might say that the Board of Agriculture was strongly in favour of this sub-section, and as that Department had a large knowledge of procedure its opinion was surely worth having on this matter. The system of two arbitrators did not work out well so far as the Board of Agriculture was concerned. When it was a question of two arbitrators the Board had power to make the appointment in default of one of the parties making it. It found that when it made the appointment the man appointed did not act in the capacity of a judicial personage, but more as an advocate, and what was wanted was a judicial personage to act as far as possible. A Scottish case came under the notice of the Board of Agriculture a short time ago in which several points of procedure were raised. One was whether the arbitration should be governed by the Agricultural Holdings Act or by the agreement in the lease, and another point was whether the arbitration should take place before a single arbitrator or two arbitrators. There was great delay in dealing with the matter, and an application was made to the Board, and before the Board could finish the necessary correspondence and make the appointment considerable further delay was occasioned. Then the landlord took proceedings in the Court of Session, and compensation was not obtained until nearly two years after the application was made to the Board. The tenant had to pay £156 for landlord's costs, and upwards of £200 for his own solicitor's costs. That was the kind of thing they wanted to avoid in the future. They wanted to simplify the procedure, and they thought the appointment of an arbitrator would do that, because as the case he had mentioned showed, there was often a difficulty as to whether on the facts of the case there ought to be one arbitrator or two. There could be no doubt that with two arbitrators the possibility of technical points being raised was increased, and there were also more risks of mistake in procedure, and in that case the whole arbitration was liable to be vitiated. If there was a single arbitrator his status would be improved. He would become more of a judicial personage, and his sense of responsibility would be increased. Of course it would not prevent an amicable arrangement being made between landlord and tenant as at present. It would be only when they found that they could not come to terms that the case would come before the single arbitrator. With regard to the saving of expense, on which he put a great deal of emphasis, obviously there must be a saving to have one instead of two arbitrators. For the reasons he had given he sincerely hoped the House would retain the sub-section.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: Will the hon. Gentleman give us some evidence of the desire on the part of tenants for the sub-section?

MR. GARDNER (Berkshire, Wokingham) said the hon. Member in charge of the Bill had called this a very small question, but there might be much mischief in a small thing. The first paragraph in the memorandum to the Bill stated that its object was to extend, cheapen, and simplify the law of compensation, etc. How it could be said to cheapen or simplify the law passed his comprehension. This Bill was full of opportunities for litigation and controversy, and, indeed, invited them, and if anything could add to the cost of the troubles that were certain to arise it was this sub-section. It made compulsory one method of deciding disputes between persons engaged in agriculture. What farmers feared was the amount of costs in dealing with their business. The hon. Member in charge of the Bill had said that landlord and tenant could amicably settle any questions that arose. On the termination of a tenancy they were bound to be represented by someone. The statement by one hon. Member that he was under the impression that the Government proposed to get a higher class of arbitrators was some reflection on the arbitrators and valuers who at present conducted the business. The arbitrators in his county, and he believed in most other parts, were perfectly competent to settle any disputes. The proposal to have one arbitrator appeared a very simple thing, but it was well known that it would cost tenant farmers and landlords a great deal more and involve more trouble. So far as he could gather the only persons who would get any benefit out of the Bill were lawyers, arbitrators, and expert witnesses. There was quite enough to contend with in agriculture at present, but if they were to have a crowd of that class of persons let loose upon them he did not know what agriculture would come to. They were to have a high class of arbitrator. He should like to know how many guineas a day he was to receive. Possibly he would come from the Board of Agriculture, and what would he know of the customs of the different counties? He would need to have expert evidence before him, and the experts would be likely to charge more than if they were working quietly between landlord and tenant. Customs in the counties differed so widely that an arbitrator coming from a distance would be forced to have local persons to advise him, and these would have to be examined and cross-examined by other expensive persons. The existing state of things had worked practically without any difficulty or friction. They appointed between them an umpire who was seldom called in. He had it on the authority of a large agent that an umpire was called in only in about one case in fifteen.

*COLONEL HARRISON-BROADLEY (Yorkshire, E.R., Howdenshire) said that as the representative of one of the largest agricultural constituencies, and as one who represented perhaps as many farmers and agriculturists as any man in the House, he thought he ought to be allowed to say a word or two on the question. There was a feeling that the clause had nothing in it except that which would cause ill-feeling and expense, and also the calling in of those who were not interested in the greatest industry of the country. He had had many communications and conversations with agriculturists since the Bill was first brought forward, and everyone who knew agriculturists and farmers had all been of the opinion that Sub-section (2) of Clause 1 should be left out. They did not know whether the arbitrators were to be men of the county in which the farm was situated, and who would thus become acquainted with the custom of the county; but at the present time they certainly had no trouble whatever in settling matters between the outgoing and incoming tenants, and he considered it would do the greatest injury if they went outside the county and took in men appointed by the Board of Agriculture to settle the question. He had great pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

*MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said he found himself in agreement with hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he believed his friends in regard to this sub-section had made a mistake. There was not the smallest desire on the part of the farmers for any alteration in the present method of arbitration when farms changed hands. The landlord and the tenant chose representatives who were familiar with the nature of the land and the local customs. They went over the farm, and they generally arrived at a satisfactory settlement. If necessary, they referred to an umpire, but that was a comparatively rare occurrence. The present method of conducting valuations entirely satisfied farmers, and it was as cheap as any mode which might be conceived. The proposed sub-section would bring in the thin end of officialism. They did not want anyone from the Board of Agriculture interfering with their decisions. There was a great deal of good work which Parliament could do, but surely it should not interfere where there was no occasion, and he was sure both the farmers and landlords of the county from which he came wished they would leave them alone as regards their methods of making valuations.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.) said he wished to ask a question with regard to the construction of the clause. Some remarks on this point had been made on the first sub-section, but it seemed to him that the construction and drafting of the second sub-section was far more serious than the first. He should like an explanation of what was meant by "this Act." Did the words mean the present Bill? The hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division said it was intended to mean the Agricultural Act, 1900, and that this section was inserted in place of the section which had been repealed. He was under the impression that they were talking about the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1883 and 1900. He did not know what was meant by the Agricultural Acts, 1883 and 1900, and as a matter of fact there were no such Acts. He understood what was meant by the Agricultural Holdings (England) or (Scotland) Act. He did not think the words "this Act" could be construed as meaning the Act of 1900.

MR. SOARES: Those words mean this Bill.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON thought that in that case the House was entitled to some explanation of why in the first sub-section "this Act" meant the Act of 1900 and why in the second sub-section the same words meant the Bill under discussion. Did the hon. Member still adhere to that position?

MR. SOARES: Yes.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON said that was all the more reason why they should oppose this proposal.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON said there was nothing in the Bill which would lead them to suppose that the Board of Agriculture would send down an arbitrator who was not conversant with the district. In Scotland they were supposed to be very careful in their expenditure, and he might point out that the system of appointing one valuator in Scotland had grown up very much in consequence of that national desire to save unnecessary cost, and also to obtain better justice.

*LORD TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham) said as a tenant farmer perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words on this sub-section. In the first instance he heartily agreed with everything that had fallen from the hon. Member for the Woodbridge division. He thought it a somewhat remarkable thing that Mr. Pretyman, who formerly represented that division, was a strong opponent of this principle, and that the hon. Gentleman who now represented the division—and who probably looked at the question from a wholly different point of view—was also a strong opponent. It seemed, indeed, to be a strong argument against the sub-section remaining as it was at the present time. It seemed to him that it would merely put upon agriculture a greater burden than that which it had to carry at the present time. He sincerely hoped those in charge of the Bill would note what had been said, and especially to what had fallen from the hon. Member for the Woodbridge Division. No doubt the promoters of the Bill, in drafting the clause, had excellent intentions, but he could only think it would put an even greater burden upon agriculture than that industry carried at the present time, and it seemed to him that the whole clause might have been drawn by an economist of the Poplar guardian type.

MR. WALTER LONG said they desired to lay down the principle that a single arbitrator should be the preferable course to adopt and that only in the event of a person desiring to have two arbitrators should that procedure be adopted. The proposal in the Bill was that one arbitrator only should be appointed. The hon. Member for Leith Burghs had said that for reasons of economy they preferred in Scotland to have one arbitrator, but it was manifest that in England and Wales they did not prefer that system. Under the Act of 1900 it was laid down that the arbitration was to be before a single arbitrator if the parties agreed on that course. It was only when the landlord and tenant agreed that there should not be a single one that two arbitrators were called in. The farmers of England and Wales did not desire a system which was contrary to their present practice. Nothing had been said to justify interference with the British tenant farmer in carrying on his own business in his own way.

*MR. BERTRAM (Hertfordshire, Hitchin) thought the clause effected a distinct saving of a step, and, therefore, he should support it. Under existing law when the tenant vacated his holding he and the landlord each appointed a valuer. If these failed to agree arbitrators were appointed, and the two valuers almost invariably became the two arbitrators. Agreement being still impossible these two appointed an umpire, and if they could not agree upon him the Board of Agriculture appointed the umpire. Under the clause now proposed the umpire disappeared, his place being filled by the single arbitrator, and a saving of one step in the existing process of valuation was thereby effected.

*MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) said that when the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill made his speech in opposition to the Amendment he used an expression the meaning of which he thought he did not quite realise, viz., that a single arbitrator would be a judicial personage. That was so, and it was just because he would be a judicial personage that it would be necessary for both parties to have somebody to represent them before him. The result of that would be that there would be three to be paid for instead of, as was usually the case at present, two only, for in the majority of cases under the existing law an agreement was come to, and the expense of an umpire, or third arbitrator, avoided. He thought, therefore, even according to their own arguments, those who supported the Bill should realise that it would be better for this sub-section to be struck out.

MR. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich) was of opinion that the Bill would be improved by the acceptance of the Amendment. The promoters had not attempted to prove that anyone had urgently demanded the alteration, and the present law appeared to be giving satisfaction to everybody. No one could say that the tenants had a grievance and everybody liked the present procedure. Why, therefore, should the House be asked to sanction a new procedure to displace one which had proved so eminently satisfactory? He thought his hon. friend would be wise if he accepted the Amendment.

*MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) said that the hon. Member for Barnstaple had argued that the principle of the single arbitrator was accepted in 1900, but he had ignored the stipulation that it should be departed from if the two parties did not agree to it. The Act of 1900 was very different from this Bill, because what the arbitrator had to decide under that Act was only in regard to improvements to the soil. Under this Bill, however, the arbitrator had to decide as to the value of certain improvements made in the soil itself, whether the game had done harm to the crops, whether the buildings had been so altered and transformed as to be of any real value to the holding, and other matters. The arbitrator would also have to be a person with a judicial mind, because he would have to decide whether a disturbance had been reasonable or unreasonable. He thought the Board of Agriculture would have great difficulty in securing persons of this extraordinary character, and they would have to pay them large fees for their services. He agreed that what the farmers wanted on this occasion was not such proposals as these; but, as a witness had remarked before the Royal Commission on Agriculture in 1897, "the only security they wanted was security from the law makers."

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) thought the Amendment would effect some slight improvement in the working of the Bill. It would be advisable if his hon. friends, the promoters of the Bill, would sacrifice the provision now in question in deference to the wishes of the farmers of the country, who were distinctly opposed to the alteration in the existing law. The question was discussed by the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and it appeared then that the farmers were opposed to any change in the law.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton) said the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would be well advised if he made the sub-section more stringent. The right hon. baronet the Member for the Lewes Division had said that the tenant farmers in Glamorganshire were satisfied, and did not wish any interference between themselves and the landlords. That might be perfectly true so far as South Glamorgan was concerned, but it was not so with respect to other parts of the country. The right hon. baronet's speech reminded him of the Chinese coolies who asked to be flogged in order to prove how beneficial were the conditions under which they lived in South Africa. According to the right hon. baronet no improvement was possible, and any effort at improvement would be repudiated so far as South Glamorgan was concerned. He had in his hand an agreement made in Lancashire which proved conclusively, so far as that county was concerned, that the landlords had certainly not only been able to look after themselves, but had taken good care that the tenant should be robbed of his rights. [" No."] He was going by the agreement which laid down the condition that the tenant should live in the farmhouse. [" Read."] A condition of the agreement was that the tenant should live in the farmhouse and keep it in a state of repair. The hon. and gallant Member for the Newport division of Shropshire would have the House to believe that if a tenant put up all manner of buildings, especially for the breeding of race-horses, compensation could be claimed in respect of them whether the incoming tenant wanted them or not. That was not the meaning of the clause. What the clause was intended to secure to the tenant farmer was compensation for unexhausted improvements. There could be no doubt that many of the tenant farmers of this country were subject to the caprice, and sometimes the political bias, of their landlords.

Mr. GUEST (Cardiff District) asked whether the hon. Gentleman was in order in discussing the whole field of the Bill, or whether he should discuss the sub-section only.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The sub-section only. The hon. Member is rather tending towards a Second Reading speech. He must confine himself to the question of the retention of the particular sub-section.

Mr. SEDDON said he thought that the provision as to the single arbitrator should be compulsory. In his own constituency many tenants had been compelled to leave their homes, and they had refused to accept the offices of the arbitrator, knowing that there was a certain amount of sympathy existing between landlords.

He was not surprised at that after hearing the speeches from both sides of the House to-day. He could quite understand that a tenant who, for political reasons, had offended his landlord, and got notice to quit, should prefer to leave his case in the hands of the landlord, because he knew that the power of that landlord might be used against him when he applied for another holding. [" Oh!"] He knew that home truths were resented by the persons affected. He sincerely trusted that the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would recognise that the measure was in the interest of a class too long under the power of landlords.

*Captain BALFOUR (Middlesex, Hornsey) said he should not like it to go out that the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture was absolutely in favour of the Bill. He had before him the Aberdeen Journal of 16th June containing a Report of a meeting of the Chamber of Agriculture held on the previous day. A proposa to approve of the clause in regard to the single arbitrator gave rise to a good dea of discussion, and an Amendment approving of two arbitrators was carried. He had never heard more irrelevant remarks than those which had fallen from the last speaker. In his part of the country tenants and landlords were not mutual enemies.

Mr. GUEST did not think the Amendment was of very great importance. So far as he could make out it would leave the law very much where it was at the present time. He thought the sub-section might be accepted as it stood. The House was composed partly, on the one hand, of landlords who did know something of agriculture, and, on the other hand, of people who knew nothing whatever of agriculture. He thought that the prejudice of those who knew something of agriculture was better for the Bill than the ignorance of those who knew nothing. It had never been his lot since he came to this House to hear any Member make such accusations or insinuations as had fallen from the hon. Member for the Newton division. The hon. Member had said that the landlords of the country only desired to rob their tenants. He understood him to say that they took good care that the tenant should be robbed of his improvements. He repudiated that statement; he thought it was grossly unfair. Where was the cry against the landlords? [An hon. Member: In Wales.] In what part? In South Glamorgan, with which he was acquainted, there was no difficulty between landlords and tenants. As a body, the landlords were as anxious to improve agriculture as the hon. Gentleman. Speaking for himself, what he felt about the Bill was that it did not go far enough.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.) asked whether the hon. Member was in order in not confining himself to the sub-section.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was answering an attack which was made upon landlords.

MR. GUEST admitted that he had been drawn into the remarks he had made by the attack of the hon. Gentleman. He could not suppose that the hon. Gentleman intended to attack the whole body of landlords.

SIR E. CARSON called attention to the very wide terms of the sub-section as it now stood. He asked the promoters of the Bill whether they really intended what the sub-section stated. In all previous legislation the arbitration had been limited to the question of improvements, but this sub-section was perfectly general. There was no limitation whatever. The sub-section said—

> "All questions which under the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1883 to 1900, or this Act, or under any custom or contract of tenancy, are to be determined by arbitration shall, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, and whether the tenancy commenced before or after passing of this Act, be determined by a single arbitrator in accordance with the provisions set out in Part I. of the Second Schedule to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900."

Did the promoters of the Bill mean that any question arising under a tenancy was to go to a single arbitrator whether it referred to improvements or not? It seemed to him that thousands of questions might arise which had no relation to improvements at all.

SIR W. ROBSON said this was not a sub-section to impose on landowners generally the obligation to go to arbitration; it only enacted that all questions, which under the various Acts or agreements were to be determined, should henceforth be determined by a single arbitrator.

SIR E. CARSON said that matters outside questions of compensation might be dealt with by the arbitrator.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said the House had now been debating the sub-section for some time, and only two Members had spoken in its favour. The reason why one Member wished it retained in the Bill was that landlords got a great deal more than they ought to get out of their tenants. In order to prove this the hon. Member said he knew of an agreement which a tenant had signed, one of the conditions of which was that he should reside in the farmhouse and keep it in repair. He himself did not think it was such a terrible thing that a landlord should look for a resident tenant, and not one who would live miles away from the farm, or that the tenant should be required to do the ordinary small repairs to the house. He did not quite gather from the hon. Gentleman's speech on what grounds he wished for one arbitrator instead of two. The hon. Member for the Leith Burghs supported the sub-section because the Scottish farms wanted it. The fact was, as had been stated, that a Motion was carried at the meeting of the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture to the effect that there should be exceptions where more than one arbitrator could be employed.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON said the question of appointing one arbitrator was discussed in relation to two points. There never was any question as to the expediency of having one valuator for improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Acts.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY asked why the Scottish tenants, if they wished to have one arbitrator instead of two, did not avail themselves of the Act of 1900. The hon. Member had referred to the case of sheep farm valuations. There could be no more crying shame than the method in which these valuations were carried out at present. The hon. Member knew perfectly well that the moment it came to a question of large sums of money, perhaps £4,000 or £5,000 one way or the other, people would not consent to go before one arbitrator. He most earnestly asked the promoters of the Bill, in view of the expression of opinion from both sides of the House, to withdraw the sub-section, and allow things to remain as they were now in the matter of arbitration.

Mr. WINFREY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

*MR. COCHRANE moved to insert "under any" after "or" in Clause 1, sub-section (2), line 4. The Amendment was of very considerable interest in Scotland. It was quite obvious that there were many large tenants who were capable of making any arrangements on a perfectly fair and equal basis with their landlords. All sorts of complicated questions arose under the leases in Scotland. There were often different classes of arbitration such as the valuation of sheep stock, the various forms of cropping, etc. Of course the ordinary way when a valuation was to be made was for each party to appoint an arbitrator, and if they could not agree an oversman was appointed on application to the Sheriff. Under this sub-section as it stood, all the friendly arrangements which had been made between landlord and tenant in Scotland, which had hitherto worked remarkably well, would be knocked on the head. If only a single arbitrator was appointed, a man who knew nothing of the particular forms of agriculture in the east country might be sent from a dairy country, and in like manner a man might be sent from a dairy country to a potato district, or from a potato district to a cattle-feeding district, to deal with valuations. He contended that the best way was to leave landlord and tenant to arrange as to the mode of arbitration. The hon. Gentleman had referred to a meeting of the Scottish Agricultural Society. He knew something of that body, and at that meeting one of the largest farmers in the country, Mr. Hope of Barney Hill, moved an Amendment against a single arbitrator, stating that he did not believe that the farmers of Scotland would be ready to tie themselves down to the clause as it stood. That Resolution was carried by twenty-one to eighteen. He would remind the House that arbitration was only substituting one court for another; and why should these responsible duties be placed in the hands of a man who had no particular training for the work? The sub-section interfered with the custom which had subsisted in Scotland for many years, and the object of his Amendment was to save existing tenancies from the operation of the sub-section where arrangements of a contrary nature had been made.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 24, after the word 'or' to insert the words 'under any.'"—(Mr. Cochrane.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

MR. SOARES said that the promoters of the Bill were unable to accept the Amendment. He believed that the principle of a single arbitrator would be good both for the tenant and for the landlord, and he utterly failed to see why existing tenants should not have the benefits which were expected to arise under this provision as well as tenants in the future.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said that those who supported the Amendment desired to maintain existing contracts entirely without a break, and that was, he believed, what 99 per cent. of the tenants desired should be done. ["No, no."] Hon. Gentlemen said "No, no," but he confidently appealed to the two tenant farmers who had spoken to corroborate what he had said. He did not think that there were more than two tenant farmers in the House, but at all events the two who had spoken had expressed themselves strongly in favour of the position he was now taking up. The Chambers of Commerce were all against the proposed change, and if the opinion of the great majority of tenant farmers was taken on the subject he was sure that they would adopt the attitude which the Opposition were taking up.

He personally did not think that this was a question between landlord and tenant. He did not regard it as a landlord question at all. As a landlord himself, he did not regard this measure as of much importance, but he did not think that the tenants were likely to get the results from it which were predicted. After all, the contracts between landlords and tenants had been entered into by reasonable men, with full knowledge on each side of the consequences of their action, and in his opinion nobody could say that in the midland counties, at any rate, the tenants were not able to make these arrangements with the full knowledge of what they meant. He thought, therefore, that the tenants would prefer the arrangements which they themselves had come to, at all events while those arrangements continued in force. In his opinion the measure was not wanted; and it would create a feeling of insecurity on the part of both tenants and landlords.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe) was glad to hear that this was not only not a landlord's Bill, but that the hon. Member did think that the tenant farmers had an interest in it. When, however, he considered the debate which had taken place, and the amount of time which had been spent upon the consideration of the Bill in the Committee upstairs, he thought the tenants would appreciate the splendid efforts of their friends in preventing the Bill from becoming law. The Labour Party were sometimes told previous to the last general election that there was a danger that if they were returned they would represent a class interest. The House had had a striking illustration to-day that class interest was not confined to those who represented the Labour Party, but that the landlords were present to represent their own interests and their own class.

*MR. SPEAKER: The subject which the hon. Member is now raising will no doubt lead to many speeches in opposition to his views, and it will be very difficult to stop those speeches, and to keep the debate within the lines of the Bill.

MR. SHACKLETON said he would not pursue the matter further, but he would point out that the Bill was discussed in a very exhaustive manner upstairs, and that it seemed to him that it was a waste of time to raise the same points again and again for the purpose of preventing the Bill from becoming law.

MR. LAMBTON said the hon. Member who had spoken last seemed to forget that there were 670 Members of the House of Commons who were entitled to discuss this matter. Personally he was not a member of the Committee to which the hon. Member had referred, and he was not acquainted with their decisions, and, the matter coming before the House on Report, he did not think they ought to attach too much importance to what had taken place upstairs. The hon. Member had talked about class interest, and of hon. Members representing one class only. It was precisely there that he had made a great mistake in reference to this particular Bill, and he did not think such references were calculated to facilitate the progress of the measure. He had been a landlord for nearly a quart of a century, and in supporting this Amendment he thought he was supporting the interests of the tenants as well as of the landlords. The hon. Member seemed to have forgotten that during the last twenty-five years there had been great depression in agriculture, and that the landlord now had to accept the tenants' terms instead of the tenant having to accept the landlord's terms. Therefore it was useless in these days for anybody to get up and say that a tenant had entered into any agreement contrary to his wishes.

MR. WALTER LONG wished to say a few words in reply to what had been said in regard to the attitude taken by himself and his friends. It was said that they were acting contrary to the interests of the tenant farmers; they were content to leave the tenant farmers to judge of their actions. They did not feel it necessary to take exception to the remarks which had been made except to point out that it was an illustration of the class of opposition to which they were exposed. They on that side were acting in the interests of ninety-nine out of a hundred of occupying tenants and also in the interests of the landlords.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Soares and Mr. Winfrey.

SIR E. CARSON moved to insert after the word "tenants," the words relating to compensation for improvements." He pointed out that the House up to a short time previously was under the impression that this clause was to substitute one arbitrator for the two insisted upon in the previous Act for this purpose, but they had now ascertained that the subsection went much further, and meant that the arbitrator was to deal not only with questions in dispute as to improvements, but with every case of dispute under the agreements which had been entered into. If anybody turned to the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900 which set up the principle of arbitration, and which this section amended, they would find that that arbitration was to be confined to compensation for improvements. The words of the section of the present Bill were the words of the second section of the Act of 1900, except that the words "compensation for improvements" were left out to make it wider. Unless it was intended to abrogate the rights of landlords and tenants under the agreements entered into, he could not see the reason for this Bill widening that section in this way.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 54, after the word 'tenancy' to insert the words 'relating to compensation for improvements.'"—(Sir Edward Carson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. ROBSON said no doubt the subsection did extend the principle of the single arbitrator to all cases in which arbitration was provided for. He thought there was no very essential distinction, so far as the tribunal for dealing with them was concerned, between compensation cases and other cases.

SIR F. BANBURY said the Solicitor-General appeared, like the hon. member for Clitheroe, to be in favour of taking away freedom of contract from everybody, and of setting up a particular class of persons to judge what other people might do. It was monstrous that when two people desired to take a certain course, the hon. member for Clitheroe, or somebody equally ignorant of agricultural matters, should step in and say they should not be allowed to do so.

Mr. SOARES rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

SIR F. BANBURY said that that was an illustration of the manner in which the Bill had been conducted, and he would say no more.

Mr. ABEL SMITH rose to continue the debate, but

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL [H.L.]

Lord AVEBURY: My Lords, I ask permission to say a word or two which may be for the convenience of the House. The Bills of Exchange Bill stands for Second Reading to-morrow, but the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, whose time has been so very much occupied lately, has asked me to postpone it for this year, and has kindly promised that he will look into it before next session. I know what great pressure he has had upon him, and I felt I could not but assent to the request. I ask leave, therefore, to withdraw the Bill.

Order for resuming the debate, on the motion for the Second Reading To-morrow, discharged; and Bill, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE COLONIES AND THE MERCHANT SERVICE.

Lord MUSKERRY rose to ask His Majesty's Government whether, according to the laws of New Zealand, the captains and officers of merchant vessels registered in that colony must be British subjects; whether it is a fact that the Government of Canada have introduced a Bill into the Canadian Parliament with the object of limiting the issue of master's and mate's certificates to Canadians; and whether His Majesty's Government will urge upon the Canadian authorities the desirability of all British subjects being permitted to present themselves for examination for certificates of the kind in the Dominion of Canada.

The noble Lord said: My Lords, as your Lordships will see by the Question standing in my name on the Paper, the New Zealand Government have very wisely and patriotically adopted the measure which I have been pressing on your Lordships for the past few years, and which I hope the present Government will adopt later on in the session. But the Government of Canada have gone a little beyond that, and in place of confining the granting of certificates to British subjects they have confined it to Canadian subjects only. As the Royal Navy is an Imperial force, so also, I think, ought the merchant service to be so regarded. I hope that His Majesty's Government will see their way to make representations to the Government of Canada as to the desirability of all British subjects being permitted to present themselves for examination.

The Earl of GRANARD: My Lords, in answer to the first part of the Question, I have to say that my noble friend is correct in stating that the law of New Zealand limits the issue of captains' and officers' certificates to British subjects alone. With regard to the second part of the Question, the Colonial Office at present have no knowledge of the Bill to which the noble Lord refers. It has not been received in this country, and, therefore, His Majesty's Government can offer no opinion on the merits of the Bill.

RAFTS IN THE PACIFIC.

LORD MUSKERRY rose to ask His Majesty's Government whether their attention had been drawn to the report of the steamer "Nebraskan," that when steaming in the North Pacific, she encountered a vast field of drifting logs, forming a dangerous impediment to navigation; and, whether, having regard to the serious dangers likely to arise through the practice of towing gigantic rafts across the waters of the North Pacific, His Majesty's Government could see their way clear to place themselves in communication with the proper authorities with a view to these dangers being avoided in the future.

The noble Lord said: My Lords, this Question has reference to the practice of towing gigantic rafts across the waters of the North Pacific. Drifting rafts form as dangerous an impediment to navigation as icebergs or rocks, and I think it is not unreasonable to ask His Majesty's Government, having regard to the serious dangers likely to arise from this practice, to place themselves in communication with the proper authorities, with a view to some regulation being adopted to minimise the danger.

THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, no report has yet been received by the Board of Trade with regard to the steamship "Nebraskan," but there can be no doubt that the towing of logs across the North Pacific does constitute a very great danger to shipping. The United States Government have had the matter under their consideration on several occasions. In 1900 they brought forward a Bill in Congress to limit the towing of these rafts across the Pacific, but the Bill did not get through. I can assure my noble friend that the matter is having the attention of the Board of Trade, and as soon as the report is received with regard to the special case of the steamship "Nebraskan" we will forward the report to the United States Government.

THE TURKISH CUSTOMS DUTIES.

*LORD NEWTON rose to call attention to the proposed increase in the Turkish Customs duties and to move for Papers. The noble Lord said: My Lords, the question of an increase in the Turkish Customs duties is a matter which has been under discussion for some time, and it arises solely from political reasons. The Turkish Customs tariff was fixed by Treaty at 8 per cent., and it is calculated, I believe, by our Foreign Office that the proposed increase will result in a gain to the Turkish Government of £750,000 a year. Of this 25 per cent. goes to the bondholders under the decree of 1903, leaving the sum available to the Turkish Government at about £560,000; that is to say, if it is collected under the present methods—methods under which what may be euphemistically called leakages to a considerable extent continually occur. But if, on the other hand, as I have heard it rumoured, the collection is undertaken by the Administration of the Public Debt, which, of course, is under European control, the yield will in all probability be considerably higher.

It has been further calculated by the Foreign Office, I understand, that no less than 60 per cent. of the increased duties will fall upon British trade. As I need hardly point out, the inhabitants of Turkey are extremely poor; the English goods which are sold in Turkey are of a somewhat superior description, as a rule, to those sent by foreign countries, and, therefore it is to be feared that the sale of British goods may considerably diminish. In return for this increased charge we are promised certain somewhat shadowy advantages in connection with mining laws in Turkey, and improvements in the Custom Houses and matters of that kind. I believe I am correct in stating that there are extremely few British subjects who are interested in mining in Turkey, and as for the promised reform in the Custom Houses and so forth, those are promises which have been very frequently made before. I would like to point out that the increase is proposed not for the benefit of international trade, but for political reasons, namely, as a means of meeting the deficit in the Macedonian Budget, a deficit which roughly corresponds to the increased sum which it is thought will be available if the proposed increase takes place.

I have so frequently brought the subject of Macedonia before this House that I really shrink from even uttering that ill-omened name, but I am afraid I must once more allude shortly to that question. Briefly stated, the position is as follows. At the present moment Europe, represented by the great Powers, is endeavouring to carry out a scheme of so-called reforms. These so-called reforms naturally cost money, and the Turkish Government represents that the increased expenditure can only be met by increasing the Customs tariff. At present, as I have already stated, the annual deficit on the Macedonian Budget amounts, roughly, to £600,000 a year. This deficit is clearly and obviously caused by the fact that the Turks are obliged to maintain a very large force in those provinces. If these reforms had really come into operation, if they really existed, and if there had been any practical and tangible improvement in the situation in Macedonia since Europe took the task in hand, then I admit at once that there would be very little to be said against devoting this increased sum to this particular purpose. But so far as I am aware, nobody who really knows the facts of the situation, nobody who is really acquainted with Macedonia and does not get his knowledge at second hand, believes for one single moment that internationally controlled finance is going to settle what is called the Macedonian question.

Everybody must realise by this time, except Count Goluchowski and a few firm optimists of that character, that the real cause of the present distracted condition of the country is not only the misgovernment of the Turks, bad enough as that may be, but the rival ambitions and mutual hatred of the Christian races inhabiting those provinces, and the designs of neighbouring States. These difficulties will never be settled by international finance. The Turks and everybody else acquainted with the situation know very well that financial reform will do little else than postpone the final smash. I am under the impression that the Turkish Government, or perhaps it would be more correct to say the Sultan, does not believe in the very least in the disinterestedness of Europe. He observes that Europe pays no attention, for instance, to what is going on in Russia at the present moment. He observes that no serious effort has ever been made to restrain the neighbouring States from waging a kind of unofficial war on Turkey. Only this afternoon I received intelligence that a large band has just gone out from Greece for Macedonia under the leadership of two half-pay officers in the Greek Army.

I am under the impression that the Sultan and the Turkish Government are firmly convinced in their own minds that no force is likely to be employed against them unless the interests of one of the great Powers is involved; this belief is probably shared by all the Mussulman subjects of the Sultan, and for that reason he will have the support of his Mussulman subjects in opposition to any reforms which may be put forward from outside. I have before expressed the opinion—it may be an exaggerated opinion—that the so-called scheme of reforms is little better than a vast international sham; but I have never flattered myself that my words have produced the slightest impression upon this assembly or elsewhere. But what I do find is corrobation from other sources. For instance, I received a letter only a few days ago, from an exceptionally well-informed gentleman who resides in Macedonia, to this effect—

> "Things are not going on well. There is going to be a suspension of payment to-morrow. General de Giorgis can get nothing done. I do not think we shall have any general rising this year, but as things are going on it is inevitable later on, and I cannot but think that the sooner it comes the better it will be for all parties. At present, people are being killed uselessly at the rate of 250 a month, and a good honest war would be far less demoralising."

Such is the state of these provinces, which for some years have enjoyed the benefit of the Mursteg programme. These somewhat pessimistic views are corroborated by correspondents who have written in the Press and the reviews, and I may claim that at all events I am not a solitary pessimist with regard to this particular question.

In face of these opinions, I might say of these facts, I would ask whether it is of much use agreeing under the circumstances to the proposed increase. It seems to me clear that, however much you may tie up these funds on paper, the money must eventually go to the support of the large military force which is now established in that country and is eating up the revenues. It is all very well to inveigh against the criminality of helping the Turks to maintain large armies for the purpose of over-aweing the population, but this large military force is part and parcel of the whole thing. These men are maintained there because the Turks intend to keep that country as long as they can, and they do not intend to be taken unawares. For my part, I do not see how it will be possible, as has been proposed, that the military expenditure should be separated from the other form of expenditure. It is clearly a part of the general expenditure, and I expect to hear the noble Lord admit that fact. I confess it seems to me that if money is going to be found for what is really a humanitarian and political purpose, it is preferable that the Powers concerned should themselves guarantee a loan; and if they really believe in the efficacy of their own reforms there surely cannot be much risk about it.

But there is another aspect of the question to which I should like to draw attention. It is perfectly plain that if this large additional sum is secured it will free an equivalent amount, and I confess it appears to me that as the proposed increase will largely fall upon ourselves, we have a right to ascertain that such sums as are liberated will not be used in any way prejudicial to British interests. My noble friend who will reply for the Foreign Office will probably tell me that Turkish Imperial expenditure is no concern of ours, a view from which I am prepared to dissent. He will probably also state that the increase will only be allowed for a limited period. This may be so, but it appears to me an absolutely illusory safeguard. The Turks, having once tasted the joy of an 11 per cent. instead of an 8 per cent. Customs tariff, will not be likely to relinquish it except under very great pressure, and, in view of the chronic financial embarrassment of that country, I think that once you have agreed to the increase it will be found impossible in practice to revert to the old scale.

By a somewhat singular coincidence, whenever an increase in the Turkish Customs tariff is mooted, the question of the Baghdad Railway again comes up. In 1903, when the question of the Baghdad Railway was before the world, it coincided with the proposed increase in the Turkish Customs tariff, and we observe the same phenomenon now. It is an open secret that it is hoped in some quarters that the proposed increase in the Turkish Customs duties will facilitate the granting of the kilometric guarantee for the Baghdad Railway. I do not wish to say too much upon the subject of that railway, but I may perhaps be permitted to remind the House that it is a purely German undertaking, and that when, in 1903, negotiations were going on for the purpose of enabling us to participate in the making of that railway, the noble Marquess who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Lansdowne) announced that it had become clear that the control over this line was to be almost entirely German, and not international in the proper sense of the word, and that we had abandoned any further idea of co-operation. And at the same time the noble Marquess made a still more important statement, warning other Powers from establishing military or naval ports in the Persian Gulf.

The Baghdad line has hitherto made very little progress. Only one section of 200 kilometres has been finished, and this section, as I know by experience, is one which was very easily made. But the line has now reached the foot of the Taurus, and it is quite obvious that very much more money will be required in order to continue it. It is plain that if the Turkish Government have more money at their command there will, at all events, be some chance of obtaining the kilometric guarantee for the line. With regard to this railway enterprise, I admit that this country cannot adopt a purely obstructive attitude. The probability is that the line will be made sooner or later, but it is much more likely to be made sooner if the kilometric guarantee is forthcoming. I am not one of those persons who are always talking about the German danger, but I think any one will admit that the prospect of a railway running from the Bosphorus in one direction to Baghdad, and in another direction to Mecca or Medina, one route entirely controlled by Germany, and the other partially controlled by Germany, is a contingency which we cannot regard altogether with indifference. Therefore, what I wish to point out is that the time has come when we ought to decide upon our policy with regard to this matter, and endeavour to come to terms, not only with Germany, but with the Turkish Government.

It is perfectly plain that as long as the Turkish Customs duties remain at their present rate, we are in a strong position. We have a good card in our hand; we have got something to bargain with; but if we surrender without obtaining a proper equivalent we are, it seems to me, to a great extent weakening our bargaining power. I urge, therefore, that a favourable opportunity has now occurred for making a bargain with the Germans and the Turks with regard to this railway, before we finally assent to the increase in the Customs duties. I have endeavoured to show, very roughly and very imperfectly, I am afraid, that there are at all events some objections to our assent being given, if it has not already been given. I have endeavoured to point out that the proposal to apply such funds to the meeting of the Macedonian deficit is open to objection, on the principle that the increase will release sums which may possibly be employed for purposes not beneficial to British interests; that the benefits to be obtained in return for our assent do not appear to be of much importance; and, lastly, that as the additional duties will affect our trade considerably more than that of any other country, commensurate concessions ought to be obtained on our part. My noble friend opposite may have a complete answer to such objections as I have made, and perhaps he will show that the Government have fully considered the points I have enumerated. All I desire to say, in conclusion, is that I draw attention to this matter not with any desire of embarrassing the Government or of making Party capital out of it, if Party capital is to be made, but with a view to eliciting a full and comprehensive statement from the noble Lord.

*THE UNDER - SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Lord FITZMAURICE): My Lords, it sometimes happens that a Minister in charge of a Department, when he sees a Notice upon the Paper in regard to what may be called current negotiations, is obliged, however unwillingly, to make an appeal to whoever has placed that Notice on the Paper to abstain from bringing it forward, on the ground that a debate would be inconvenient to the negotiations which were proceeding. But upon this occasion I made no such appeal to my noble friend, although well aware of the courtesy with which he always meets any appeal that is made to him in regard to foreign affairs, because this is one of those rare occasions when, so far as I am able to judge, a debate in this House, instead of being in any way injurious to the pending negotiations, may, on the contrary, be useful as tending to remove certain current misapprehensions, and to strengthen rather than weaken the position of His Majesty's Government.

My noble friend has very accurately, in the rapid survey which he has made of a very large and many-sided question, pointed out that when you begin to discuss an increase in the Turkish Customs duties, you immediately touch on the question of Macedonian reform on the one side, and on the even more delicate and difficult subject of the Baghdad railway on the other. That is why the subject excites an interest that would not attach to a question of dry finance. Broadly speaking, the question of the increase of the Turkish Customs duties has, ever since 1880, been mixed up with the subject of the revision of the commercial treaties with Turkey. But, owing to the delicate character of the questions involved, owing to the political complications which have constantly arisen, and owing to the dilatory habits and methods of the Turkish Government, it has not been found possible to arrive at a general revision of the commercial treaties with Turkey, a matter which affects not only this country, but all the great European Powers. Therefore, when the last grave set of questions arose, to be dealt with by his Majesty's late advisers in Macedonia, the question of the Turkish Customs and all the controversies that surround it stood exactly where they stood a considerable number of years ago, except that growing years had, if anything, aggravated the political situation, and that the Turkish Government was becoming more and more anxious to get hold of increased revenue.

There was, therefore, no reason to be astonished that the trained diplomatists of the Ottoman Empire, when called upon to introduce reforms into Macedonia, took the opportunity of bringing to the notice of the Foreign Office how very desirable it would be to let them have a little more money. But the matter was not so simple; and the Blue-books show that, from the first occasion on which the Turkish Ambassador approached His Majesty's Foreign Secretary it was pointed out that, instead of a revision of commercial treaties, if a simple arrangement of an increase by 3 per cent. of the ad valorem duties which govern British trade with Turkey were granted, it would be necessary to attach strict conditions to any agreement on our part. Thus it was that the question of Macedonian reform and that of the increase of the Turkish 3 per cent. Customs —though having a distinct history— became mixed up together.

The close connection of the two questions was the other day insisted on by the Austro-Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs in addressing the Hungarian Delegation. That passage in Count Goluchowski's speech has not received the attention which it deserves. From the beginning the British Government have marched in line with the Austro-Hungarian Government. The passage in Count Goluchowski's speech to which I refer was as follows—

> "The immediate cause of the naval demonstration was the refusal of the Porte to consent to the demand of the Powers for the appointment of an International Commission of Finance nominated for a limited period for the purpose of organising the financial administration and obtaining such guarantees as would ensure the revenue obtained by taxation being applied in the future to the requirements of the three vilayets. Especial justification for this demand was to be found in the fact that in the meantime Turkey had claimed to be allowed to make a 3 per cent. increase in her import duties—a measure recognised by the Powers as an absolute necessity, if the so-called Macedonian Budget were to be made to balance; and that several Cabinets, and amongst them, above all, the English Cabinet, had made their acceptance of this increase in the Customs duties conditional primarily on the concession to them of a direct participation by their own representatives in the work of organising the produce of taxation in future."

After decided pressure by the naval demonstration, the moderate demands of the Powers, which included the appointment of the Commission, were agreed to, but they were not found to contain the full measure of reform which, with the unanimous consent of the people of this country, the late Secretary of State had desired to incorporate. That was not owing to any weakness on the part of His Majesty's Government, but owing to the impossibility of inducing other Powers to come into line.

The unfortunate consequence of the Foreign Office's finding itself obliged to moderate its demands is that at this moment the chapter of Macedonia reform is, for the time being—and I lay stress on that qualification—closed by the acceptance of the Commission. Because, as that Commission only began to operate in January, it would be impossible, whatever the wishes of His Majesty's Government might be, for us to come forward and reopen all those questions which only a few months ago were, for the time being, closed. Having accepted the reforms, for whatever they were worth, in December last, it is the duty of His Majesty's Government to give those reforms some little time to operate. But, in regard to that part of Count Goluchowski's speech which relates to the Turkish 3 per cent. Customs, we stand on different ground. The noble Marquess opposite pointed out most clearly and distinctly in the different Notes which were addressed by him to the Turkish Ambassador and in the despatches which he wrote to our Ambassador at Constantinople, that upon grounds mainly commercial, but in some cases partly political, there were other conditions besides the Financial Commission which must attach to the consent of this country to the increase of the 3 per cent. Customs. Those conditions included improvements in the Custom houses, the removal of those grievances, or as many of them as possible, under which trade suffers from the antiquated and obstructive method of levying duties at the Turkish ports, the peculiar hardship with which a certain interpretation of the meaning of existing duties falls upon some classes of English goods, and the removal of the antiquated provisions of the Turkish mining law, which so greatly hampers the investment of capital, especially in Asiatic Turkey, which is beginning to have a new and growing importance for the world at large. These were the commercial conditions.

But there was another condition which, no doubt, grew out of, although it was not absolutely contained in, the agreement in regard to the Financial Commission. There was the condition accepted by the Porte during these discussions, though not absolutely incorporated textually in the law of the Vilayet itself, that the money necessary to balance the vilayet Budget should be provided by the Turkish Government out of Imperial revenues, so that the local revenues of Macedonia might be used to defray local expenses and the heavy military expenditure which the Turkish Government insisted on keeping up should not be thrown on the unfortunate inhabitants of the vilayets. These questions have not been lost sight of by His Majesty's Government.

I have seen with some astonishment statements recently appearing from gentlemen ordinarily well informed in these matters, who have addressed communications to the Press, apparently under the belief, which they think to be well founded, that the whole of this question of the 3 per cent. Customs has been agreed upon, and that the Foreign Office has walked into some trap. I cannot agree with the noble Lord that the conditions in regard to the mining laws, the levying of duties, and the improvements in the Customs are small or unimportant matters. I have enjoyed the advantage of discussing these questions with gentlemen of great knowledge and experience in Turkish finance and commerce, and they take a more favourable view of the matter than the noble Lord. I think, however, that, putting these questions aside, His Majesty's Government would not have met with the approval of either House of Parliament if they had not been in a position to say, as we can, that we have adhered strictly and sternly to the policy of our predecessors in insisting that we shall have adequate guarantees that the money arising from the increase of the 3 per cents., if ever collected, shall find its way into the Budget of the Macedonian vilayets, and shall not go to Constantinople to be played with and used for any purpose which the Government of the Porte way think desirable.

The machinery which we have proposed to call into play for the object I have described is the machinery provided by what is known as the Commission of the Ottoman Debt. The Commission of the Ottoman Debt is a body whose existence is well known, and there is a convincing reason why the Government have decided to press on the Porte the adoption of the machinery of the Ottoman Debt Commission rather than that of any other body. Dealing with the Porte in matters of this kind is a long and dilatory process, and if you can find some proposal which is more likely than another to be acceptable to the Porte, it is wise to adopt it. The advantage of suggesting the machinery of the Ottoman Debt Commission is that it is looked upon as an Ottoman service. A proposal to the Porte to work either in this matter or in any other through the Ottoman Debt Commission does not meet with the amount of resistance that might arise over a proposal of a European commission appointed by foreign Governments.

Apart from this, however, the Ottoman Debt Commission has been a singularly honest and successful service. It is perhaps almost the only bright spot in Turkish finance. I might compare it—though the comparison is not a complete one—to the position of the European Customs in China. Just as the European Customs in China are the bright spot amid a chaos of utter confusion, so is the work of the Ottoman Debt Commission in Turkey. That Commission is not a body which merely takes a certain amount of money and hands it over to certain bondholders. No doubt this was its first origin and what called it into existence; but gradually, owing to the great skill of the financiers who have had control of its operations, it has been entrusted with the collection as well as with the administration of certain funds, and the taxes which it collects with the consent of the Ottoman Government have gradually gone on increasing. At this time it collects the sheep tax, the sites tax, and what are known as the six revenues—namely, salt, stamps, silk, fisheries, tobacco, and spirits. Under a Decree known by its Turkish name of Mouharrem, and a later Decree amending it, it has also the right of collecting any future increase that may arise in the Customs, and of allotting a certain proportion of the net revenue so collected for the benefit of the bondholders, and then of handing over what remains—namely, 75 per cent.—to the Turkish Government. Here, then, was a machine ready to our hands, and which, probably with the consent of the Porte, we could use to collect revenue, to earmark it for a particular purpose; and to see that it found its way into the account of the Budget of the vilayets at Salonika.

Those were the conditions which, after communication with the Powers, we were able to place as the unalterable demands we attached to the consent of this and the other Governments to the increase of Customs duties; and, in addition, we required that there should be fair notice given so that the increase of Customs should not come into operation like a thief in the night, but should be limited to a certain period. That period was eventually fixed at seven years. I am glad to inform your Lordships that we were also able, by the good will chiefly of the representatives of the Great Powers at Constantinople, to obtain the assent of those whom they represented; and a Note was handed to the Porte in the last days of May embodying these demands, and stating in unmistakable language that there was no question of receding from the demands so made, and that if the Turkish Government desired to have this increase of revenue they must make up their minds to carry out in practice as well as promise the demands made upon them by the Ambassadors who signed the Note.

I was in hopes until recently that it might possibly be my good fortune this evening either to have left my story there or that probably in a few days I might have been able to announce the result of the negotiations. But that is not the case. The Turkish Government has during the last few days sent a reply to the Note which we had every reason to believe would have been accepted in a friendly spirit, raising so many new points, and suggesting so many changes in what we have put forward, that I think I am not in the least exaggerating my statement when I say that the most correct account I can give of the present state of the negotiations is that they practically stand at almost exactly the same point at which they stood when the late Government left office. The responsibility of this lies entirely with the Turkish Government; but in any case the result is entirely to absolve His Majesty's Government from those rather unwarrantable and hasty imputations that have been made by those who have rushed forward to say that the whole matter is settled and that the Turkish Government has proved itself to be master of the situation.

The noble Lord opposite has introduced the question of the Baghdad Railway; and he has pointed out what is no doubt theoretically true, that if all our terms are accepted by the Porte, and if this large surplus is handed over to the account of the Budget of the vilayets at Salonika, other revenues now in the possession of the Porte, and now theoretically being under the obligation appropriated for the use and the benefit of the Budget of the vilayets, might in conceivable circumstances be used for the purpose of finding a subvention for the Baghdad Railway. I do not desire to go into this great and difficult question. It is one of the greatest questions of the time. It occupies the same sort of position in the Oriental world which many years ago the making of the Suez Canal occupied; and every step which this country takes and every word which the Foreign Secretary or the Under-Secretary uses about it must be carefully weighed and considered. But I cannot help pointing out to my noble friend that I think his fears are rather premature. Turkish finance is not to be reasoned about as if it were, let us say, British finance under the control of Mr. Gladstone. Turkish finance is a mass of confusion, and no doubt the Turkish Government will be in a position to use certain revenues which may be liberated; but I cannot think that between those revenues and the Baghdad Railway there is anything but a rather distant connection. Unless we are prepared to assume the permanent control of Turkish finance as a whole, how is it possible for us to say that certain revenues—assuming their existence, which is to assume a good deal—will be liberated, and at once used for the particular purpose of constructing the Baghdad Railway? No doubt in theory some revenues may be liberated; and, just in proportion as the collection and control by the Commission of the Debt of all the revenues which they collect is successful or not, the revenue liberated will be greater or less.

But the Turkish Government has many prior claims upon it—for instance, the arrears of pay to all its servants, civil and military; improvements long due which it ought to make at once; there is the suppression of the rebellion in Arabia, and large borrowings on current account which have to be repaid; and we cannot say to the Turkish Government, unless we are prepared to travel another long step on the road of interference, "You shall do this, and you shall not do that with your surplus revenue. You shall pay your Civil servants; you shall reduce your army; you shall not construct this railway, but you may construct that one" —and so on. But what we can say, and what we are saying, is that the increase of the Customs shall not be used for any purpose until the limited yet important object for which we have assumed responsibility is first satisfied—namely, the balancing of the Macedonian Budget.

In regard to the Baghdad Railway, we are not of opinion that its construction is necessarily a British interest in itself, but it does raise many questions which are of British interest, and affects others; and these are receiving careful consideration. I cannot say more on that subject now beyond this, that we do not think that to proclaim, as we are apparently invited to proclaim on the house-tops, that we shall object to the increase of the Turkish Customs merely because indirectly such a step might be of some advantage to the construction of the Baghdad Railway is a course which prudent statesmanship recommends. We should then appear in the unenviable position of the dog in the manger, and should probably incur the hostility of great interests without whose goodwill this question cannot be placed on a permanent or satisfactory basis.

This word only in conclusion. I have told your Lordships that the Turkish Government have practically, by their reply to our Note, adjourned this question. What, however, I would venture to point out to the Turkish Government is this, that although we consider that the immediate chapter for the time being of Macedonian reforms is closed by the law of the vilayets, if by any action of the Turkish Government it is made impossible to make these reforms really thorough and satisfactory, then the great Powers will be fully justified in opening a new chapter. I would venture to urge that point of view on the Turkish Government; and in any case, if the Turkish Government fail to realise that in our negotiations with regard to the increase of the Customs we have gone as far as possible in concession to their demands—so much so that we have been threatened almost within the last few days with the censure of our friends—they must bear in mind that the immediate remedy that his Majesty's Government are fully justified in urging upon them is that, if they will not make it possible even with our good will and with the consent of the other Powers, to find money in the way that has been suggested, they must immediately adopt the only other remedy which they can adopt and reduce the enormous military force which, as I think, is quite unnecessarily kept up in Macedonia. These explanations will, I trust, be satisfactory to my noble friend. I only ask him and his friends to believe that we are fully conscious of the great importance of the issues involved in this question, and we can only hope that the House and the country will acknowledge how difficult our task is.

Lord SANDERSON: My Lords, I venture to think that the very full statement which has been made by the noble Lord the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is as satisfactory as any one could expect in such very perplexing circumstances. It was once remarked by a Naval Lord of the Admiralty that no one could conceive the sufferings of an officer in command of a second-class torpedo boat except the officer himself; and that he had not words to describe them. I think it may be said, in the same way, that no one can realise the perplexities and difficulties surrounding the question of Turkish reforms except those who have to deal with them, and that they are never allowed to reveal more than half of them. There is one main principle to which we pledged ourselves by the course we took in regard to the Treaty of San Stefano, and to which we have always adhered—that of working in concert with the other Powers. The method is no doubt tedious and slow in practice, but it is sound and safe. I do not think that in the present circumstances we could have departed from that principle by making further conditions in regard to the concession of the increased Customs duties, and I trust that His Majesty's Government will continue upon the same lines.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, as my noble friend has truly said, this important subject has always been treated by your Lordships as one altogether outside the scope of party controversy; and it would have given us great pleasure to congratulate His Majesty's Government if they had been able to tell us that they had found it possible to effect a thoroughly satisfactory settlement of these difficult and embarrassing questions. But the concluding announcement made by my noble friend makes it clear that once again the perversity of the Turkish Government has rendered impossible an arrangement which, so far as I was able to follow the outline given by my noble friend, would have been upon the whole a very advantageous one to them. I cannot help hoping that, if the negotiations should be renewed hereafter, His Majesty's Government may find it possible to stiffen their conditions somewhat and really to open what my noble friend describes as a new chapter in the lamentable history of these transactions.

The settlement upon which His Majesty's Government were on the point of entering was certainly one which deserved very careful consideration by your Lordships' House. We were on the point of agreeing to an increase of 3 per cent. in the Customs duties levied on the goods of this country. I do not suggest that this is a very crushing burden on our trade, but it is certainly an appreciable burden, and one which we had no right to submit to except in the face of inexorable necessity. Then by accepting this addition to the Customs duties we should have deprived ourselves of a lever which I believe it would be possible to use to very good effect in any negotiations on any subject with the Turkish Government. I therefore should certainly be inclined to say, do not let us accept that burden, do not let us let go our hold on that lever unless we are absolutely satisfied that we obtain an adequate return for the sacrifices we are asked to make.

There are two directions in which it is possible to look for such a return. There is, in the first place, the possibility of obtaining in consideration of the sacrifice some improvements in the conditions under which British commerce is carried on in Turkey. I gather that such concessions were to have been obtained —I mean such concessions as the improvement in the administration of the Turkish Custom Houses and certain improvements in the mining regulations—concessions which I believe Sir Nicholas O'Conor, whose high authority I am the first to recognise, regards as of considerable value to this country. But when we are told that we are to be recouped in this manner I think we have a right to make the rejoinder that some of the most scandalous abuses to be found in the administration of the Turkish Customs are abuses which ought to be redressed as a matter of right without the offer of anything in the shape of a bribe or any increase in the burdens to which our trade is called upon to submit.

Another point which it seems to me should be considered, and which, I hope, will be considered, is this—what security are we able to obtain that these improvements in the Customs administration, these new mining regulations, these alterations in the manner in which British imports are to be examined at the port of entry will be continued to us? We have had a very bitter experience of the value of Turkish promises. I should be glad if it were a feature in any settlement of the kind we have been discussing this evening that the 3 per cent. increase of the Customs duties should not be allowed to come into operation until, by an experience spread over a certain length of time, we had become satisfied that the ways of the Turkish Customs authorities had really been amended.

LORD FITZMAURICE: I think it will be found, as I said, that all those matters have been considered and will be found touched upon in the Note which we presented, and which, of course in time will be laid before your Lordships. The conditions which were placed before the Turkish Government followed closely the conditions laid down by the noble Marquess, and which are to be found in the Blue-books before the House.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: That is not quite my point. My point was that not only should the conditions be insisted on, but that we should insist on having a certain amount of experience of the way the new regulations were carried out before the increased duties were allowed to come into operation. Although, therefore, I admit that concessions of this kind are not without a certain value, I am bound to say that the coin is one in which I do not think I should care to be paid in full for so great a concession as we are called upon to make on our side.

But there can be no doubt, if we are to speak frankly about these things, that the real return which we have been expecting to get for agreeing to the 3 per cent. increase is that we should secure better government in the Macedonian vilayets. Now it may be said, Why should you tax the trade of this country, and of a particular section of the trade of this country, in order to obtain better government for a part of the Turkish Empire? I think the only answer that can be given is that the present condition of Macedonia is a standing menace to the peace of Europe and that it is, therefore, to the interest of this country as it is to the interest of all the civilised Powers that the condition of those regions should be improved.

We have acted upon that assumption throughout. We have taken great trouble, we have submitted to considerable sacrifices, in order to bring about some improvement of the condition of Macedonia. Therefore, I for one would certainly agree with his Majesty's Government in saying it is right that we should submit to sacrifices such as the sacrifice involved in this increase of duties in order to bring about more orderly and more decent government in Macedonia. Then my noble friend who introduced this subject, and has studied it so thoroughly, threw great doubt upon the value of these reforms.

LORD NEWTON: Hear, hear!

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am not surprised to hear my noble friend's cheer. Like him, I have been again and again disappointed in my hopes of seeing better government introduced in Macedonia; and I admit that many of those schemes for which such high hopes were entertained have greatly disappointed their authors. But I am bound to say that it does seem to me that the appointment of this Financial Commission is by far the longest step that has yet been taken in the direction of an amelioration of the state of affairs in Macedonia. I think we can gauge the value of the step by the reluctance with which it was accepted by the Turkish Government. It was accepted by the Turkish Government only, so to speak, at the point of the bayonet. I think that shows pretty conclusively that they, at any rate, know what a serious matter it is for them.

It is, no doubt, true that a considerable part of the scheme to which the Financial Commission was to give effect was whittled away during the course of the negotiations and that the réglement does not at this moment stand at all in the same form as that in which it was originally framed. I gather, nevertheless—and here, again, I am greatly guided by the opinion of Sir Nicholas O'Conor—that, though something has been taken, a good deal has been left. The scheme provides for improvement in the administration of the tithe, for the more regular payment of the local officials, for the framing of a proper Budget, and for a much-needed improvement in the prisons administration. I say, then, that the scheme is worth something — worth more, I believe, than any scheme that has yet been put forward. If that is so, it seems to me to follow that the scheme cannot operate unless there are sufficient funds to enable effect to be given to it. I think I am right in saying that the Financial Commission have reported that without additional funds they are unable to carry the scheme out.

LORD FITZMAURICE indicated assent.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I see that I am correct. If that is so, then I think that His Majesty's Government could not have taken upon themselves the responsibility of shipwrecking the scheme by withholding their consent to this increase of duties. There is, however, a preliminary question which, I think, ought to be asked, and I shall be glad if it can be answered—namely, is it quite clear that the necessary funds, which amount to about £600,000, cannot be provided by the Turkish Government without increasing the Customs duties? I remember that, when the proposal was first made to the late Government, I raised that question. I asked whether a more careful and honest administration of the revenues of the three vilayets would not provide, perhaps not the whole of the sum needed, but something towards it.

I also raised the question whether an improvement in the administration of the Turkish Customs as a whole would not provide a sum amply sufficient to supply the deficit of the Macedonian Budget. The whole yield of the Turkish Customs does not, I believe, exceed £2,000,000. I refuse to believe that, with decent administration, the Turkish Customs could not be made to produce a very much larger sum. I should like to be told that the resources of diplomacy had been exhausted with regard to these two points before the 3 per cent. increase was agreed to. I may be told that difficulties have been encountered with the other Powers in obtaining consideration for a proposal of that kind. It was said with absolute accuracy by my noble friend on the Cross Benches hat, in all these matters we have endeavoured to keep the European concert working, and I am aware that we have not infrequently had to change our step because others would not keep pace with us.

There is another point which I should like to mention in passing. I gather from my noble friend that His Majesty's Government are satisfied that this extra 3 per cent. which will be, I think, in the form of a surtax, will be collected in such a manner by the Commission of the Debt that there will be no doubt whatever that it will be applied to and find its way to the Administration of Macedonia. If the 3 per cent. were not more honestly and carefully administered than the present 8 per cent., I think it highly probable that the Macedonian vilayets would not get the £600,000 which they require.

One word about military expenditure. The military expenditure is a terrible burden upon the Macedonian finances. I believe the military expenditure in the three vilayets reaches something like £2,200,000 a year.

LORD NEWTON: No, £1,300,000

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The noble Lord is quite right. It was £2,200,000, and it is now £1,340,000 a year. There at once is a saving of over £800,000 a year. Is it clear that this £800,000 a year would not have sufficed, or partly sufficed, to make good the deficit without an addition to the burdens on the trade of this country? With regard to the military question generally, it is our duty to bear in mind that we cannot expect the Turks to get rid of the whole of their forces in Macedonia unless we are prepared to take upon ourselves the responsibility of protecting the Turkish frontier against inroads from Bulgaria or from other quarters. I remember that at one stage of these negotiations I ventured to put forward proposals which contemplated a guarantee of that kind, but those proposals must be added to the many well-meant efforts which have failed to succeed on account of the reluctance of other Powers to support us.

I should like to say one word before I sit down as to the question of the Baghdad Railway. I agree with my noble friend opposite that it would be a fallacy to suppose that because the increase of the Customs duties provides a certain additional sum to meet the requirements of the Turkish Government in Macedonia it follows that an equivalent sum is automatically liberated for other purposes That belief is founded upon a misapprehension as to the chronic condition of Turkish finances, and it by no means follows that these additional duties will give the Turkish Government an equivalent sum to dispose of as they think fit. But there is another point which, I think, was not touched upon by my noble friend opposite. The prospect of the increased yield in Customs duties being indirectly applied to the Baghdad Railway seems to me a remote one, for this reason: that I understood my noble friend to say that the consent of his Majesty's Government was given on condition that the increase was to be for seven years only. If that is so, it is clear that the Turkish Government would not be in a position to hypothecate the extra revenue and to obtain upon the strength of it a capital sum which they would be free to expend upon the Baghdad Railway. I entirely agree with what has been said by Lord Newton as to the importance of this question of the railway. I have always recognised the necessity of safeguarding British interests if ever there was a chance of that railway being pushed through to the Persian Gulf. When the question was being discussed in 1903 we were in confidential communication with some of the great financial houses concerned in the matter, and we hoped to see an arrangement the result of which would have been that the line—a part of which is now a purely German line—should be rendered international from sea to sea. If that could be done by proper guarantees, there would be no occasion for us to adopt towards it an obstructive attitude, which my noble friend opposite very properly deprecates.

To sum up these few remarks, I think his Majesty's Government would, in certain circumstances, and for an adequate consideration, have been justified in agreeing to an increase in the Customs duties. But I confess that the bargain as it has been described by my noble friend opposite does not seem to me in all respects a very attractive one, and if ever there should be a question of reopening the negotiations, and negotiating a further settlement, I trust that, both for our own sakes and in order to read the Turkish Government a lesson, which I think they richly deserve, we shall insist upon conditions not only as stringent as those they have now rejected, but considerably more advantageous to ourselves and imposing a heavier obligation upon them.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, the tone of the speech of my noble friend who has just sat down has been so fair in regard to this most important question that I have not a word of controversy to say. We have been really walking in the footsteps of the noble Marquess opposite. We have been endeavouring to obtain the Porte's acceptance of the conditions which he laid down when in office. Unfortunately, up to the present time, we have not been successful, and the last communication received leads us to fear that the negotiations may almost be considered to have come to an end. My noble friend Lord Fitzmaurice alluded to the collective Memorandum which was presented to the Porte at the end of May. It is a matter of very great importance that in regard to this question—so delicate and yet so grave—we shall continue to act, as His Majesty's late Government acted, in concert with the Powers of Europe. The Note presented was a collective Note. If these negotiations fail, and if the attempts which have hitherto been made to come to a settlement of the question upon lines based very much upon the policy of the late Government should not be successful, then the hands of the Great Powers will, in our judgment, be set free. If the Porte rejects those proposed conditions and sets free our hands and those of the great Powers with whom we desire to act in perfect union, we shall be perfectly entitled then to put forward other proposals involving other conditions in order to bring a question which has been threatening the peace of the world to a final and satisfactory conclusion.

LORD NEWTON: I should like to ask the noble Lord the Under-Secretary whether he is going to publish any Papers, and, if so, whether they will include the reply of the Porte to which allusion has been made in the course of this debate.

LORD FITZMAURICE: Papers on the subject will undoubtedly be published, but I cannot undertake to lay them on the Table at once. The Papers will include the Note and the reply.

THE NAVAL VISIT TO RUSSIA.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether, on the occasion of the visit of the British Fleets to Russian ports, British sailors will be asked to fraternise with Russian sailors implicated in the North Sea outrage in 1904. There can be no doubt that the projected visit of our Fleet to Russian ports has created an unpleasant surprise. Under ordinary circumstances no comment would have been made, but we cannot deaden our feelings with regard to what took place in the North Sea and also to the horrors which are being perpetrated in Russia. The organised slaughter of so many Jews and the massacres of men, women, and children in Russia are surely reasons why we should stand aloof from any action which might be looked upon as implying either satisfaction with or indifference to what has taken place and is taking place.

The British Fleet is the sign of British power. Its presence is at times a token of British friendship, and no doubt the Government of the Tsar will welcome the presence of the British Fleet as a sign of moral support. We know, of course, that that is not the object of our Fleet's going to Russian ports; but at the same time it is impossible to believe that the presence of our Fleet will not be looked upon both in Russia and outside as a sign of the sympathy and goodwill of this country. We ought not to take any step which might cause our sympathies to be misunderstood in any part of the world. Our officers and men will be called upon to toast and cheer the Tsar and his Government at festivities, and, I suppose, to forget what happened in the North Sea less than two years ago. They will thus be placed in an uncomfortable and undesirable position.

What occurred in the North Sea two years ago was of a very wanton character. We are now asked to forget the incident or to treat it as being of no consequence. It cannot be right that our sailors should be called on to swallow the insult of having to fraternise with men who could act as the Russian Admiral and officers did on that occasion. There are events in history which are not quickly forgotten; and the outrage in the North Sea is one of them. I ask His Majesty's Government at least to say that those who were implicated in this outrage shall not be amongst the hosts by whom our sailors are to be received.

*LORD HENEAGE: My Lords, I rise with considerable hesitation, because on this question I think the least said the soonest mended. But I cannot help saying—and I speak on behalf of the people of Hull, as well as on behalf of the fishing industry generally — that we deeply regret that the question of the outrage two years ago has been revived by the noble Earl. If my noble friend had confined his Question to general remarks with regard to the fêting of the Fleet, and the fraternisation generally of one fleet with the other, I should not have thought right to interfere; but I cannot sit silent when I find that the whole of the Question is based upon the outrage which was committed in the North Sea in 1904. The Question solely, explicitly, and entirely refers to that outrage. Our fishermen have desired, as far as possible, to forget and forgive what happened in the North Sea, and at the present moment they desire, more strongly than perhaps anybody else, to carry on their operations in friendly intercourse with the fishermen of other nations, and they wish to be friends with the Russians now that the whole thing has blown over.

That the outrage was grave there can be no doubt, but we may recall to mind with admiration the self-restraint which was exercised by all those engaged in the fishing industry during those trying days, which I am sure my noble friend, who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, will well remember. Those engaged in the fishing industry were perhaps cooler than almost any other class in this country, and I think they earned the admiration of the whole civilised world for the moderation and truthfulness with which they gave their evidence before the Conference at Paris, which was in direct opposition, as may be seen by the Report, to the evidence of Captain Klado, and those who tried to bring allegations against this country.

Two years have passed over. We have been fishing in the North Sea, and have been on friendly terms with the Russian Government. It is most desirable that we should as far as possible remain on friendly relations with all the signatories of the North Sea Convention, and I cannot help thinking that it is an unwise step at the present moment to revive in any way the lamentable occurrence which we deplored at the time and which we have tried to forget. I would remind my noble friend of another point. The Tsar spontaneously and most liberally did all he could to compensate those who had suffered by the loss of relatives or property, or who had themselves been injured. That compensation was given, and there is not the slightest doubt that everyone was fully satisfied in that respect.

This Question on the Paper to-day will go forth to the foreign Press as a revival of dislike, on the part of English fishermen, that our seamen should associate with Russian sailors on the occasion of the visit of the British Fleet to Russian ports. The Question will go forth as it stands upon the Paper, whilst the speech of the noble Earl will either be mutilated or not properly reported. We have had some experience during the last year of what I would venture to call the gutter Press of Germany in relation to our seafishing industry; and it is not nine months ago that I read a travesty of the action of English fishing boats in the North Sea. It was said that English fishermen behaved so badly that the Danish Government were compelled to capture them and take them before their courts, whilst Germans were treated in an entirely different manner, being, on account of their extremely good conduct, given a hint directly they got within the three-mile territorial waters. There was not one word of truth in that statement, and we have since received a contradiction of it from the Danish Government. But, after this Question everything will be done to stir up differences between this country and Russia. I regret therefore that the question has been brought forward, and I hope His Majesty's Government will give such an answer that we may at any rate continue in those friendly relations which happily obtain at present.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I was not aware before that Russian fishermen were in the habit of fishing in the North sea. But I would like to point out that the Question which my noble friend has put has nothing whatever to do with fishing. It relates to a serious outrage committed by an armed fleet of the Russians on our fishermen. Whether that outrage was committed for some political cause, and to try and save their name, or whether all on board were blind drunk and incapable, we have never yet heard; but it is an utter impossibility that any sailor could have mistaken trawlers for torpedo boats. I fully agree that it was not the unfortunate seamen who fired the guns or the officers, but the person in command of that fleet who was to blame for the committing of that outrage. When our Fleet goes to Russian ports it will be with the high officers of those ports that they will be in communication. It is between them that the civilities will take place. My noble friend is, therefore, fully entitled to put the Question, and I hope His Majesty's Government will return a favourable answer.

*LORD ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I do not know whether His Majesty's Government have sufficiently considered the extremely difficult position in which our officers and men will be placed if, during their visit to Russian ports, riotous or political demonstrations take place. They may have strict orders not to utter a single political opinion; but no one can prophesy when or where an outrage or riot will take place in Russia at this moment, and it would be extremely inconvenient if, when our sailors were on their way to any entertainment, they were met by a riotous procession. In that event some very disagreeable diplomatic complications might arise.

*LORD NUNBURNHOLME: My Lords, I rise to say a few words on this question because it is intimately connected with the city of Hull, which I represented in the other House for thirty-two years. Also at the time of the outrage I happened to be the chairman of a similar fishing company to the one attacked—a fishing company with some sixty steam trawlers and carriers occupied exactly in the same way as the fleet that suffered this outrage. It was only just by chance that our fleet did not suffer in the same way. I cannot help thinking that this Question is inopportune and unfortunate. It is two years since, and the feeling at that time in the city of Hull was very extreme, but it has, I believe, died out. A circumstance at the present time rather proves that. I am asked in a short time to unveil some memorial of the Russian outrage. I made inquiries, and found that the fishermen generally have not joined in this desire to perpetuate the memory of that event. It was, no doubt, a very terrible outrage, but I quite agree with the noble Lord opposite that the matter should now be allowed to rest. The fishing trade in the North Sea is a very big one, and it has a great many supporters who can take care of it. If there were any question of any feeling existing at the present moment it might have been desirable to raise the Question which my noble friend has placed upon the Paper. I know a great deal about the Russian trade. It is a very large one, and, in spite of all the difficulties and the misfortunes of the Czar and his country, in which we cannot help sympathising, an enormous trade is going on between England and both the Baltic and the Black Sea. I therefore feel sure that the Government will give no encouragement to the raising difficulties which I cannot help thinking would be very unfortunate in the present position of affairs.

LORD FITZMAURICE: My Lords, it used to be a favourite observation of the late Lord Derby when he was Foreign Minister that it was a good thing, wherever possible, to limit the area of European disturbance. Lord Derby was speaking of limiting disturbance in regard to place. I venture to think that your Lordships will believe it to be equally important to limit the area of disturbance in regard to time. The events to which the noble Lord has called attention by his Question happened some time ago. They represent an incident which is closed. Unfortunate as they were, they were undoubtedly owing to misapprehensions; and they have been, as regards the great interests more immediately affected, I will not say forgotten, but certainly forgiven. I might perhaps point out to the noble Lord that his Question almost carries with it its own answer. The noble Lord does not mean to suggest either that the sailors or the captains of ships, the Foreign Office, or the Admiralty have been asked, or are likely to be asked, to fraternise, for before anything could happen in the direction suggested by the noble Lord a request for fraternisation would have to arrive. I can assure the noble Lord that we have not received any request bearing on the Question, neither has the Admiralty, as far as I understand. But putting aside any technical advantage I might take of the form of the Question, I think that the great majority of your Lordships and the country at large will feel it is best in this matter to let bygones be bygones.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: Do I understand the noble Lord to say that there will be no festivities on the occasion of the visit of the British Fleet to the Russian ports?

LORD FITZMAURICE: I did not say that.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: If there are festivities there must assuredly be fraternisation. In this affair I was not referring to the fishing interests. I was referring to our Fleet going to Russia at this time when events of a most deplorable kind are taking place, thereby giving a kind of moral support to the Government of the Tsar.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

The Proposed Transfer of Workmen from Chatham Dockyard.

MR. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, after the representations made to the Government, the decision of the Admiralty to remove 200 men from Chatham to other dockyards is still to be adhered to; and, if not, whether he can put an end to the anxiety felt in Rochester and Chatham by announcing the present intentions of the Admiralty in this matter without delay.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) It is not proposed to transfer these men to other yards.

Sick Pay for Mr. Carmody, Sorter at Mount Pleasant Parcel Office.

MR. J. P. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the Postmaster-General if his attention has been called to the case of the sorter, Mr. Carmody, of the Mount Pleasant parcel office, whose pay was stopped for ten days in June, 1905, notwithstanding he was certified unfit for duty by the official medical officer for Limerick, and who has been further punished by having his increment deferred during the present year; and whether he will inquire into the merits of his case.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have already personally investigated the case of Mr. Carmody, and I am satisfied that his absence from duty in June, 1905, was not properly covered by medical certificate. Sick pay could not therefore be allowed to him. It was necessary to defer his increment, which otherwise would have accrued in April last, until a certificate of twelve months approved service could be given. This certificate I am glad to learn was given on July 1st, and in that case the increment will be allowed from that date.

Post Office Servants—Entries on Defaulter Sheets.

MR. J. P. NANNETTI: To ask the Postmaster-General what is the departmental rule in regard to making entries against a man on his official record sheet; if an officer applies would he be supplied with a copy of the entries made against him; if trivial reports made against a man by an official, on being dismissed in the man's favour after investigation by superior and competent authority, are recorded against the man on his record sheet; and whether an official is allowed to cause entries to be made against a man simply because he, the official, suspected, reported, and attempted to show that the man had committed an offence against discipline, notwithstanding the fact that the man proved his innocence of committing any disciplinary offence, and the reports falling through.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am not sure what is the precise information desired by the hon. Member in answer to the first part of his Question. An officer would be supplied on application with a copy of the entries made against him. The Answer to the remaining parts of the Question is in the negative.

Report of Departmental Committee on Death Duties.

MR. SEARS (Cheltenham): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the date when the Committee was appointed which considered the question of assessment and collection of death duties, which sat in 1898 under the chairmanship of the present Secretary of State for War; and where the evidence given and the Report of the Committee are to be seen.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The Committee was appointed in 1898, and reported to the Treasury early in 1899. The Report was treated as confidential, in accordance with the practice usual in respect of the Reports of Departmental Committees on establishments, and was not published.

Rex v. Watt—Cost of Deportation of the Witness Shuttle.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under which Vote in the Estimates the special service fund (at the expense of which the witness Shuttle, in the case of Rex v. Watt was sent to Canada) will appear.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The special service fund is not provided in the Votes of Parliament, but by a charge on the Consolidated Fund, forming part of the civil list charge, as the hon. Member will see on reference to page 43 of the annual Finance Accounts.

Commission of the Peace—Fees and Stamp Duties.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether he will state what are the total fees payable, by stamp duty and otherwise, by gentlemen appointed to His Majesty's Commission of the Peace in England, because of their appointment.

(Answered by Sir John Walton.) The only amount payable to Crown officials by English magistrates on their appointment to His Majesty's Commission of the Peace is the sum of one pound, payable to the Exchequer on the insertion of the names, irrespective of number, in a Commission of the Peace. With regard to the fees payable locally to clerks of the peace I beg to refer you to my replies to the hon. Member for the Guildford Division of Surrey on May 2nd and June 14th respectively.†

Kew Garden Employees—Right of Combination.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if his attention has been called to the notice posted at the Royal Botanic Gardens, to the effect that any person employed in the Royal Botanic Gardens who desires to make a complaint must send it in writing, with the complainant's name, to the curator, who will lay it before the director, and to the effect that it is strictly forbidden to make a complaint through an outside person, and any case of the kind will be regarded by the director as a serious breach of discipline; and will he say whether, in view of the right to negotiate through their representatives recently conceded to the workers of several Government Departments, he will have the notice removed, in order that the workmen at the Royal Botanic Gardens might enjoy the same privilege as the men in other Departments.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) My noble friend the President of the Board gave directions in February last that the same procedure should be followed with respect to representations made by or on behalf of the men employed at Kew Gardens as that sanctioned in the case of Post Office servants. The notice referred to by my hon. friend was issued in 1903, and it is now in course of revision.

Importation of Live Cattle for Immediate Slaughter—Suggested Removal of Restriction.

DR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, as there has not been a case of foot-and-mouth disease either in Denmark or Holland for three years, and, according to the Return of the German Imperial Board of Agriculture, no case of foot-and-mouth disease for more than a year in Schleswig-Holstein, Oldenburg, Hanover, Westphalia, or the Rhine provinces, the Board of Agriculture will consider the advisability of at once removing the restrictions at present imposed on the importation of live cattle and sheep for immediate slaughter at the Deptford Foreign Cattle Market.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The experience of the last fifteen years has shown that, owing no doubt to their geographical situation, outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease may be expected to occur both in Denmark and Holland from time to time, and this being the case, and in view of the terms of the Disease of Animals Act, 1894, my noble friend regrets that he cannot consistently with his statutory duty make any modifications in the restrictions referred to. I may add that twenty-one cattle were attacked with the disease in Denmark in 1904, and that there were two cases in Holland in the same year.

Indian Army Officers and Service with Militia during South African War.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): To ask the Secretary of State for India, are officers who, previous to joining the Indian Army, served in the Militia during the South African war with Army rank, and who, under the terms of War Office letter No 6/163d, June, 1905, are allowed to count such embodied or war service towards pension or gratuity in the British service, permitted to count it towards pension and promotion in the Indian Army in the same way as they would be allowed to count it if, at the time, they had borne commissions in the Regular Forces; and, if not, will he explain why not.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) Officers of the Indian Army are allowed to reckon as service for Indian pension their service out of India before joining the Indian Army, to an extent not exceeding two years, and service in the embodied Militia is considered as service out of India for this propose. Promotion in the Indian Army is regulated by service from date of first permanent commission, and, therefore, under regulation, time in the embodied Militia does not reckon as service for promotion. It is the practice, however, specially to allow any such time passed on field service to reckon for promotion.

Indian Educational Expenditure.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that in the last quinquennial report on the education of the Government of India, compiled by Mr. Nathan, of the Indian Civil Service, the amount of direct expenditure on elementary education out of State funds, apart from fees and local funds, was stated to be only £90,000 for the year 1901–2, the last year for which figures were given; and will he state what corresponding amount was spent by the State during last year.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I am not yet in a position to answer this Question, but I hope very shortly to receive from the Government of India a reply to the inquiry which I addressed to them when the hon. Member first gave notice of the Question.

Alleged Wrongful Imprisonment of Ryots at Backergunj.

MR. O'GRADY: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Lack, the settlement officer at Barisal, has been complained against for wrongful imprisonment of the tenants (ryots) of two lady zemindars of Backergunj and other persons in the locality; that the complaint was dismissed by the local magistrate, Mr. Emerson, in his private room, without a hearing, as frivolous and false; whether such action lies within the power of Mr. Emerson; and whether, in view of the state of public feeling in the new province, he will say what steps he intends to take in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) As I stated in answer to a Question on the 21st June,† I have no information as to the facts, but I will inquire and consider whether any action is necessary.

Irish Society and the Professor of Irish at Trinity College, Dublin.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Society nominates the professor of Irish in Trinity College, Dublin, and pays his salary, or whether the professor is subject to the jurisdiction of the board of the college in the same manner as all other professors.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Irish Government have no official information upon this subject, but the Question has been referred to the Provost of Trinity College, who states that in the year 1840 a number of gentlemen connected with the Irish Society subscribed a sum of money to aid in the foundation of a professorship of Irish in the university, but the society, as such, had no part in the foundation of the chair. The then board of Trinity College, in agreeing to this foundation, undertook to pay annually the difference between the interest of this sum and £100 a year, to provide for the study of the Irish language, pending the further collection of funds for the endowment of the chair. Public subscriptions raised the fund to a figure which when invested in Bank of Ireland stock gives on an average £100 a year. In the year 1871, by a decree of the board and visitors, the salary paid by the college itself was raised to £100 a year, so that the total salary of the professor is about £200. The funds subscribed by the public are invested in the names of the provost and fellows of Trinity College and the professor of Irish, and the election of the professor is vested in the trustees, who at present are the provost and the two Parliamentary representatives of the university ex officio together with Lord Ashbourne and Lord Ardilaum, who were co-opted some years ago by the then ex officio trustees under powers given to them by the deed of trust. These two latter trustees have never taken any action in connection with the chair. The professor, like other professors, is subject to the jurisdiction of the board, and no other body has any authority or jurisdiction over him.

Erection of Labourers' Cottages.

MR. P. A. McHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what action has been taken by local authorities with regard to the representations for the erection of forty-eight labourers' cottages which were forwarded by the Estates Commissioners to the Local Government Board and district councils in the period from November 1st, 1903, to March 31st, 1905, under Section 96 of the Land Act of 1903.

† See Col. 350.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that, as a general rule, no action has been taken by the rural district councils concerned in relation to such representations. In a few instances the consideration of the matter has been postponed until the council are making a new improvement scheme under the Labourers Acts, as the expense of making and carrying through a scheme for one or two cottages included in a representation would be entirely out of proportion to the result. To remedy this defect, a clause has been inserted in the Bill now before Parliament, providing that the representation shall practically be a scheme taking effect forthwith where the Local Government Board so order. A table will be appended to the Board's Annual Report for 1905–6, showing up to March 31st last the name of each rural district affected, the nature of the representations made, and the action, if any, taken thereon.

Sale of Estates in County Sligo.

MR. O'DOWD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of estates sold to tenants in the county of Sligo, and sanctioned by the Estates Commissioners, from the coming into operation of the Act of 1903 to the date of the last Return, the number sold by private treaty, and of those sold through the Estates Commission, with the average number of years' purchase given in each case respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that since the commencement of the Act they have made advances in the case of fourteen estates in Sligo sold direct by landlords to tenants, the average number of years' purchase of the tenanted land being 23·6. In the same period four estates in county Sligo were purchased by and vested in the Estates Commissioners, the average number of years' purchase of the tenanted land being 21. The Commissioners have no information as to sales effected by private treaty.

The De Freyne Estate—Construction of a Road to the Village of Sheepwalk.

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain why, although the Congested Districts Board has purchased the estate of Lord De Freyne, no attempt has been made to provide a proper approach to the village of Sheepwalk; and whether he is aware that the want of such approach is causing great inconvenience to the population from day to day.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Congested Districts Board have included, in their proposed scheme for the improvement of the De Freyne estate, the construction of a road to the village of Sheepwalk. The work, however, cannot be commenced until the estate has been legally vested in the Board.

Evicted Tenant on the Madden Estate—Case of M. A. Kiernan.

MR. T. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware of the fact that an evicted tenant named M. A. Kiernan, residing at Aughakiltubrid, Cloone, county Leitrim, on the Madden estate, which has been sold recently to the tenants at twenty-four-and-a-half years' purchase, was refused the right to purchase by the landlord, unless the amount of the arrears of rent due was added to the purchase money; and if he will call the attention of the Estates Commissioners to this case, so that the evicted tenant may get the same terms as the other tenants who have purchased their holdings.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the former holding of Mary A. Kiernan is included in the lands for the sale of which the owner has lodged an originating application, but no purchase agreement in respect thereof has been lodged. Mrs. Kiernan's application for reinstatement will be inquired into by the Commissioners when they are dealing with the estate.

Withdrawal of Grant from Corlea School.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Commissioners of Education in Ireland have given notice that they will withdraw all grants from Corlea school after June 31st next, being a vested school under Church of Ireland management; how long these grants have been in existence; and whether the Commissioners of Education have made any arrangements for the religious instruction of the pupils attending Corlea school in the event of that school being closed and the children compelled to attend the nearest school, which is under Presbyterian management.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that by order of February 13th, 1906, they directed the withdrawal of grants from Corlea school from June 30th, upon the ground that it is no longer required, as there is sufficient provision for the education of the pupils at other national schools in the locality. The school is under Irish Church management, but is non-vested. It has been in connection with the Board since 1859. Thirteen of the pupils belong to the Irish Church, twelve are Presbyterians, and five are Roman Catholics. Two schools are available for the pupils, namely, Gillygooley, one-and-a-half miles distant, under Irish Church management; and Aughee, one-and-a-quarter miles distant, under Presbyterian management. As the latter school is a vested school clergymen have, under the Board's rules, the right of access to the pupils of their own denomination for the purposes of religious instruction in the school.

Refusal of Chief Secretary to Receive a Deputation from Irish Protestant Teachers Union.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he declined to receive a deputation of the Irish Protestant National Teachers Union; and, if so, on what grounds.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I informed the committee of this organisation that, owing to the many matters of immediate importance which called for my attention, I found it impossible to receive a deputation, but at the same time I told them that I should be happy to consider any written statement of the matters which they desired to bring to my notice. I have since received a statement from the committee and will give it due consideration, but the question raised in it is largely one for the Commissioners of National Education.

Evicted Tenants in County Kerry.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether an inspector has been sent to inquire into the cases of evicted tenants in Kerry; and, if so, whether he can report any reinstatements.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that one of their inspectors has been inquiring into the cases of evicted tenants in Kerry for some time past, but he has as yet reported no reinstatements as the result of his operations. Negotiations for reinstatement are, however, proceeding in a number of cases.

Purchase of Mr. Walsh's Estate at Castletown, County Kilkenny.

MR. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an application has been made by Mr. Walsh, the owner of an estate at Castletown, county Kilkenny, to the Estates Commissioners, for the purchase of the estate from him; if so, when; whether a large proportion of this estate consists of evicted holdings in his possession; and whether, with a view to the restoration of these tenants, the Estates Commissioners will direct an inspector to visit the lands without delay.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that on January 22nd last Mr. Peter Walsh offered his estate for sale to the Estates Commissioners under Section 6 of the Act of 1903. The property comprises 165 acres in the occupation of tenants, as well as 129 acres of untenanted land which Mr. Walsh wishes to repurchase. The Commissioners have received applications from five evicted tenants for reinstatement in their former holdings on this estate. The case will shortly come before the Commissioners for their directions as to an inspection of the property.

King's Scholars' Examination—Books Recommended.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the fact that in the programme for the King's Scholars' examination for 1907, formulated by the Irish Commissioners for National Education, dated March last, amongst the books recommended for general reading, along with the works of authors like Shakespeare, Goldsmith, Scott, and Stevenson, is included "Some experiences of an Irish R. M."; can he state what official is responsible for this selection; and can nothing more useful be officially recommended to King's Scholars.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Commissioners of National Education that they are themselves responsible for the selection of the book referred to, which is considered to be suitable for general reading.

Cases of James Clancy and William Francis—Award of Arbitrator.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Wexford District Council, at a recent meeting, condemned by resolution the action of the arbitrator, Mr. Cliff Owen, by which he awarded, in the case of James Clancy and William Francis, £15 and £21 17s. 6d. respectively, whilst the council's offer was £5 and £8 10s.; whether he can state the basis by which the arbitrator arrived at the award; and if he will make provision in the Labourers' Bill to prevent awards of this kind.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Local Government Board have received the resolution referred to. The facts, however, are not correctly stated in the Question. In the case of James Clancy, who claims £10, the council offered £5, and the arbitrator awarded £8 10s., of which £1 was allowed for special injury to the claimant's lands. In the case of William Francis, who claimed £37 10s., the council offered £15, and the arbitrator awarded £21 17s. 6d. The arbitrator arrived at his decision after taking into consideration the sworn evidence of all the parties and after inspection of the plots. It is not proposed to make any alteration of the law as regards arbitration.

Condition of Terryglass (County Tipperary) Graveyard.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will cause the Local Government Board to institute an inquiry into the condition of the Terryglass, county Tipperary, graveyard, now reduced to a commonage for cattle owing to the falling of the protecting wall, with the object of ascertaining who is responsible for the state to which the graves and headstones have been reduced, and of compelling those legally liable to at once put the place in proper repair.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Local Government Board informed the rural district council in November last that, as the burial ground in question is attached or contiguous to a place of worship, the provisions of Section 185 of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, do not apply to the case; and the Board suggested that the council should address the representative church body, in whom the burial ground is vested, and urge them to carry out the necessary repairs. The Board have not since received information that anything has been done, and they are not aware of any remedy in the matter unless the district council are prepared to take upon themselves the responsibility of executing the repairs needed.

Labourers' Cottages at Athenry.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been directed to a set of resolutions passed by the townspeople of Athenry on the 24th ultimo; is he aware that a mistake in the measurement of the labourers' cottages has been discovered; that the Antiquarian Society claim 22 feet of the gardens all about and around the old King's Castle of Athenry, and that a drain, 16 feet wide and 90 feet long, also runs through the land on which one of the cottages has been built; and what steps do the Local Government Board propose to take in order to protect the rights of these labouring men.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I understand from the Local Government Board that representations to the effect stated in the Question were made some time ago to the district council, but it was found on investigation that these representations were not correct. The Town Tenants' Association at Athenry has recently forwarded to the Board and to the district council a resolution on the subject. The council, having regard to the previous investigation, declined to take any further action in the matter, and the same view was taken by the local Government Board.

Purchases of Untenanted Land on the Cusack Estate.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state the result of the negotiations by the Estates Commissioners for the purchase of the untenanted lands on the Cusack, county Longford, estate; whether the solicitor in charge, Mr. Daniels, has made any further motion to delay sale; and when a definite decision will be given.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the Estates Commissioners' offer for the purchase of this estate, including both the tenanted and untenanted land, has now been accepted by the Land Judge. The registrar of the court informs me that there are no grounds for the suggestion that the solicitor has endeavoured to delay the sale.

Distribution of Bog on the Granard Estate.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any complaint has reached the Land Commission as to distribution of bog on the Granard estate; whether in several cases tenants have been deprived of turbary guaranteed to them under their vesting orders; and, if so, will an inquiry be made by an inspector as to their cases, and the possibilities of getting turbary supplies for them elsewhere on the same estate.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am afraid I can add nothing to the very full reply given by my right hon. friend the Attorney-General for Ireland to the hon. Member's Question of February 26th.† If any tenant purchaser has been deprived of his legal rights he has his remedy at law. The Land Commissioners have, I am informed, no power to intervene in the matter with the object of procuring turbary for the tenant purchasers, and no purpose, therefore, would be served by their having an inquiry made.

Elephant Marsh Game Reserve, Central Africa.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the facts that the elephant marsh game reserve extends up to Chironio town, which lions actually enter, so that the inhabitants go in fear of their lives; that several lives have been lost; that destruction of lions within the reserve is not permitted; that game of the same class as is preserved in this reserve exists in other parts of the British Central Africa Protectorate, where also game reserves have been established; that Chironio is a town growing in size, population, and importance; that complaints do not proceed from local planters, but from the inhabitants of the town; that no claim is put forward, or application made, for any of the land included in the reserve for cultivation, or for speculative purposes; and whether, in view of these facts, and for the reason also that injudicious reservation is prejudicial to the cause of game protection in Africa, the Government will consider the propriety of calling upon the Commissioner to amend the boundaries of the elephant marsh reserve, so as to remove it to a safe distance from the township of Chironio.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) As I informed my hon. friend on May 14th,‡ the Secretary of State has already addressed the Commissioner of the British Central Africa Protectorate on the subject referred to in this Question, and he proposes to await the reply to his despatch before taking any further action.

Kaffirs Employed in the Transvaal.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state the number of Kaffirs employed in the Transvaal Colony on May 31st, 1906, by the Public Works Department, by the military authorities, in domestic service, and in trade generally respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The latest figures received of natives holding passports and working in labour districts of the Transvaal are those for April 30th, which give 95,458 for mines and works, and 84,522 for other employ, but they do not show how this last number is distributed among various employments.

Extension of Railway from Djibuti to Harrar.

MR. REES: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can make any communication to the House regarding the extension inland of the railway from Djibuti to Harrar.

† See (4) Debates, clii., 793.

‡ See (4) Debates, clvii., 175–6.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) The matter still being under negotiation, I am unable at present to afford the hon. Member the desired information.

Small Holdings Committee—Witnesses from Caithness.

MR. R. L. HARMSWORTH (Caithness-shire): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will state the names of witnesses from Caithness who gave evidence before the departmental committee of the Board of Agriculture when in Scotland recently to inquire into the subject of small holdings; if he will state the qualifications of the witnesses to give evidence on the subject of small holdings; whether the witnesses' expenses were paid out of public moneys; and whether any fees were received by the witnesses.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) I have communicated with Lord Onslow, the chairman of the committee, and he desires me to say that the names of the witnesses referred to are Mr. John Miller, of Brabsterdorran, and Mr. James Nicolson, of Watten. Mr. Miller is a parish councillor, who rents a small holding and has made a lifelong study of the land question, and Mr. Nicolson is a factor who has the management of several estates on which a number of small holdings exist. No fees are paid to witnesses, but they receive their travelling expenses and subsistence allowance on the usual Treasury scale, the cost being defrayed from the Vote for Temporary Commissions.

Cambridge Cottage, Kew.

CAPTAIN BALFOUR (Middlesex, Hornsey): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he can state whether any steps will be taken during the present year to carry out the intention of the Government to utilise the house and grounds of Cambridge Cottage, Kew Gardens, as a museum illustrative of forestry, pomology, and the diseases of farm and garden crops.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) We have addressed representations on this subject to the Treasury, but our proposals have not been sanctioned, and I am afraid that there is no prospect of the necessary funds becoming available during the present financial year.

Return of Battleships.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that five battleships, which are described as first-class battleships in the recent Return (Fleets of the Powers) issued to Parliament, were, in the last Statement of Admiralty Policy, issued by Lord Cawdor in November, 1905, characterised as so defective that even if two millions were spent on them the nation would merely have acquired indifferent ships, three-quarters worn out, and so poorly protected as to be vulnerable to second-class cruisers; and whether he can explain how these vessels came to be included in a Return which has been widely quoted as showing our great strength in first-class battleships.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) Ships whose armaments have not been surrendered or reduced are classified in this Return as heretofore.

American Gambling Operations in Tin—Danger to Home Trade.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, owing to American gambling in warrants in tin in London, a corner was lately formed and the price thereby artificially raised to £203 per ton, thus entailing loss to British manufacturers in Birmingham, the Midlands, and South Wales, and that, owing to the action of a bear clique in London, the corner has collapsed and the price has already declined in a state of panic some £29 per ton, or to £174, thereby again disorganising the whole trade, besides jeopardising the newly developed mining industry in Cornwall; and whether he can state what steps His Majesty's Government intend to take in order to prevent a recurrence of these gambling operations, with the object of protecting legitimate commerce and home industries.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am aware that the price of tin in London rose from £160 5s. per ton at the end of 1905, to £213 at May 15th, 1906. Since that date the price has declined almost continuously, and on June 28th, it stood at £177 15s. Both the rise and fall appear to be due to a combination of causes among which no doubt speculation has been an important factor. Other causes are the state of the world's supply and stocks of tin, and the conditions prevailing in the tinplate trade. I do not consider that any steps could usefully be taken by His Majesty's Government in this matter.

Great Southern and Western Railway Company and Mr. Peter Dowling's Water Supply.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Southern and Western Railway Company have been in the habit of cutting away the water supply from the mill of Mr. Peter Dowling, Straboe, Maryborough, Queen's County, which passes under their line, causing loss and inconvenience to the millowner and his customers, which they decline to pay compensation for; and will he see that this practice on the part of the railway company is discontinued.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) My attention had not previously been called to the matter referred to by the hon. Member, but it is not one in which the Board of Trade appear to have any power to intervene.

Danger from Sparks from Engines on the Great Southern and Western Railway (Ireland).

MR. DELANY: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that extensive damage has been done to residents along the Great Southern and Western Railway (Ireland) in consequence of sparks flying from their engines igniting hay, straw, and dwelling-houses situated adjacent to the line; whether he is aware that the company are using new and powerful locomotives, without the necessary safeguards to control sparks being attached; and will he see that proper restrictions shall be enforced to protect the property of those living along the line.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) No complaint of the damage referred to by the hon. Member has been received by the Board of Trade, but in any case the Department have no powers which would enable them to take the action suggested.

State Grant to Catholic Elementary Schools in Manchester, Preston, Southampton, and Bristol.

MR. C. J. O'DONNELL (Newington, Walworth): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether he can state what is the amount per child of State grant and of rate aid for Catholic elementary schools of Manchester, Preston, Southampton, and Bristol for the last ended financial year.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Board have no information as to the sums spent upon voluntary schools (as distinct from the council schools) from the rates. The gross annual expenditure per child on maintenance in respect of council and voluntary schools taken together, during the most recent year for which figures are available, was in Manchester £4 4s. 0d., in Preston £2 9s. 7d., in Southampton £4 6s. 11d., and in Bristol £3 12s. 1d. These figures include the amounts contributed from Exchequer grants and from the rates, and from other sums, if any, received from fees, or endowments, or other sources. So far as can be gathered from the records, the total Exchequer grants, including the special aid grant under Section 10 of The Education Act, 1902, paid in respect of the same year, amounted, so far as the Catholic schools only in these towns are concerned, to an average of £1 19s. 7½d. per child in the case of the twenty-five Catholic schools in Manchester, taken together; to £2 0s. 9d. in the case of the seven Catholic schools in Preston; to £1 19s. 9d. in the case of the two Catholic schools in Southampton; and to £2 0s. 6½d. in the case of the five Catholic schools in Bristol.

Pensions Withheld from Inmates of Irish Lunatic Asylums.

MR. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has, as promised, looked into the question of pensions withheld from the inmates of Irish lunatic asylums, and if he is now able to state that a sum equivalent to the amount so withheld will be paid into the local taxation account, or to make the pensions payable to the persons who are dependent on the pensioners.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I have looked into this question, and I find that no pensions have been withheld from the inmates of Irish lunatic asylums, which could legally have been paid to them. After making the deduction, if any, necessitated explicitly by Section 7 of the Superannuation Act of 1887, the net pension is paid to the local authority which is responsible for the maintenance of the pensioner in the asylum. If it is more than sufficient to cover the cost of his maintenance therein, the balance, after deducting the cost of such maintenance, is paid to his representatives.

Loans Under the Housing of the Working Class Act.

MR. ARMITAGE (Leeds, Central): To ask the President of the Local Government Board what loans have been allowed during the last two years under the Housing of the Working Class Act repayable over eighty years.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The number of loans of the kind referred to in the Question is twenty-two, and they amount to the sum of £258,962. I shall be happy to give my hon. friend a list of them if he so desires. I may add that the number above stated is exclusive of several loans which comprise not only items of expenditure for which eighty years would be allowed, but also other items for which a shorter term would be granted. In such cases an equated period of less than eighty years has been fixed for the repayment of the whole loan.

Assaults by Natives on British Soldiers Stationed in the Himalayas.

MR. REES: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will communicate to the House any particulars regarding assaults alleged to have been committed this summer by natives of India upon British soldiers occupying stations in the Himalayas.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I regret to have no information available, but will address the Government of India on the subject.

Harbour Improvements at Wicklow, Arklow, and Portavogie.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what progress has been made with the work of harbour improvements at Wicklow, Arklow, and Portavogie, for which provision was made in the Vote for the Ireland Development Grant of 1905–6.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) In each of the cases mentioned further progress awaits action by the local bodies concerned. Wicklow: The sum of £10,000 as a maximum is to be paid to local authorities undertaking the works, subject to the approval by Government of the plans, and to the certificate of the Government engineer as to the execution of the works. Arklow: The Government await the receipt from the Harbour Board of plans and estimates for the proposed works. Portavogie: The County Council of Down have submitted plans and estimates for a scheme entirely different from that originally proposed by them and accepted by the right hon. Gentleman when in office. This fact was pointed out to the Council on 16th May last, but no further communication has yet been received from them.

Mullaranny and Belmullet Railway—Intention of the Government.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now able to make an announcement respecting the intentions of the Government as to the construction of a line of railway between Mullaranny and Belmullet?

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am not at present in a position to make any statement on this subject which, owing to the number of alternative schemes and the difficulty of finding funds, is one of great complexity.

Extension of Cavan and Leitrim Railway.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is in a position to make a statement with respect to the extensions of the Cavan and Leitrim railway, for which provision was made in the Vote for the Ireland Development Grant of 1905–6.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I understand that progress in this matter has been interrupted by local opposition, which has manifested itself in an expressed intention on the part of the County Council to oppose the necessary legislation to be promoted by the railway company. In these circumstances the Government, while regretting the interruption in the progress of what they regard as a useful scheme, are unable to interfere.

Hillas Estate, Templeboy—Case of Patrick Foley.

MR. P. A. McHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the purchase of the Hillas estate, Templeboy, county Sligo, has been completed; whether he is aware that a tenant on this estate named Patrick Foley, of Dunowla, Templeboy, is being threatened with eviction for non-payment of £11 10s., one and a-half year's rent, by the agent on this estate, Mr. Richard Robinson, of Sligo, unless he agrees to purchase at a price fixed by the agent; that this tenant was evicted in 1895, and his house thrown down, and afterwards admitted as a future tenant on payment of £67 2s. 1d. by himself and a brother in America; and whether he will ask the Estates Commissioners to investigate the case of this tenant, with a view to prevent undue pressure being put upon him by the agent?

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the originating application for the sale of this estate was lodged on the 11th April last, and will be dealt with in its order of priority. The Commissioners have no knowledge of the circumstances mentioned in the Question, but, before sanctioning the advances applied for, the Commissioners will duly inquire into the circumstances under which no purchase agreement has been lodged in the case of Patrick Foley, a tenant on the estate.

Purchase of Errieff Grazing Farm.

DR. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether negotiations are going on between a grazier and the owner of a grazing farm called Errieff, on the Phibbs estate in the parish of Keelogues, near Castlebar, county Mayo, with a view to the purchase of this farm; is he aware of the number of many small uneconomic holdings in the vicinity of this farm; and will he see that it is purchased, either by the Congested Districts Board or the Estates Commissioners, for the benefit of those people who live on uneconomic holdings.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I have no information as to any negotiations for purchase which may be proceeding in this case. The property has not been offered to the Congested Districts Board, but the Board will, at their next meeting, consider the question whether they should make an offer for purchase.

Suggested Withdrawal of Grant from Roughfort School.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Templepatrick and Mallusk national schools are within one mile from Roughfort school; and whether, in view of this fact, he will consider the advisability, in the interests of economy, of recommending the withdrawal of the grant from Roughfort school.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the question of the necessity for Roughfort national school has already been under their consideration, but in view of the recent increase in the average attendance, they have decided to take no action for the present. The attendance for the quarter ended 31st March last was 36.

Dismissal of Teacher of Roughfort National School.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state why the teacher of Roughfort national school, county Antrim, is being dismissed by the manager.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education have no information on this subject.

Damage to Rathlin Island Fishing Ground by Steam Trawlers.

MR. GLENDINNING (Antrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that damage is being done to the Rathlin Island fishing by steam trawlers trawling quite close to the island; and whether he will take any measures to prevent this practice being carried on in future?

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Department of Agriculture have received no complaints on this subject, and are not aware that damage is being done. Should any facts be brought to their notice showing the necessity for investigation, they will deal promptly with the matter.

Increment for Teacher of Scartaglen National School, County Kerry.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of delay in intimating to the teachers of Scartaglen national school, county Kerry, Roll No. 8184, the granting of increments of good service salary, seeing that they are entitled to the same by the annual examination reports for the last three years, the same describing the school as good, very good, and excellent.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the question of granting increments of continued good service salary is at present under their consideration. In the particular cases referred to, the decision of the Commissioners will be announced at an early date.

South African Mineowners and Payment of the War Debt.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the president of the responsible Government Association declared recently, at a meeting held in Johannesburg, that he had reliable information that the mine magnates wished to control the country for five years, during which time they intended to import thousands of free Chinese to extract the last ounce of gold from the mines, and then to retire and leave the Colony burdened with debt and swamped with Chinamen; and whether the Government will take measures to enforce the payment of the guarantee given by the mineowners to meet war expenses.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I have read in the newspapers that such a statement was made and immediately contradicted. The undertaking given by certain mineowners was not a guarantee to pay, but only a guarantee to underwrite £10,000,000 of a loan to be raised by the Transvaal Government when the market conditions were favourable. Any such war contribution would, of course, need to be voted by the new Legislature under responsible government.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Overtime in the Royal Dockyards.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the decision to avoid working overtime as much as possible in the Royal dockyards will in any way alter the policy of the Admiralty, as outlined in Lord Cawdor's statement of Admiralty policy, of completing four armoured ships in the year, and more if Foreign Powers increased their programmes.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The question of overtime will not affect the policy adopted as regards new construction.

New German Battleships—Cost of Gun Armaments.

MR. RIDSDALE (Brighton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Amiralty what is the estimated cost of the gun armament of the new German battleships, as laid down in the German Navy Estimates.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The total sum appearing in the German Navy Estimates under the heading Gun Armament is £660,470 per ship. This would appear to include, however, not merely guns, but mountings and armour. The Admiralty have no further detailed information.

MR. COWAN (Surrey, Guildford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Admiralty adhere to the description of the two new German battleships, given in the Return of Fleets, No. 129, issued last May, as designed to have a displacement of 17,710 tons and an armament of eight 11 inch and twelve 7·5 inch guns.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Admiralty have no later definite information regarding these battleships.

Trades Union Rate of Wages in Royal Dockyards.

MR. JENKINS (Chatham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether in view of the intention of the Government to recognise the trade union rate of wages in the dockyards, and in view of the Admiralty having received a petition from the men on the subject, it is the intention of the Admiralty to act up to that intention, and when?

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Admiralty have received, and are now considering, a large number of petitions from the dockyards. These petitions will be dealt with in the spirit of my statement in the course of the debate on 1st March,† but it is not at present possible to say how soon such changes as may be necessary will take effect.

Chatham Dockyard.

MR. JENKINS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the area of the land covered by the Government dockyard at Chatham, and the estimated value thereof, the number of and estimated value of the building slipways, the capacities and estimated value of the floating and dry docks, and the estimated value of all the machinery and buildings.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The area covered by the dockyard proper may be taken as approximately 500 acres. The building slipways are four in number, and there are three basins and eight docks, a detailed statement of the dimensions of which I propose to send to the hon. Member. No precise valuation of this property is possible, and even a rough estimate would require considerable time and labour to compile.

Rosyth.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, when he proposes to make a statement as to the policy of the Government in the matter of Rosyth.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I shall not be in a position to make any statement on the subject during the present session.

MR. YOUNGER: Are we to understand the right hon. Gentleman adheres to the statement of policy he made in March last.‡

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I am unable to add anything to what I said then.

MR. YOUNGER: But you withdraw nothing?

H.M.S. "Montagu."

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, when the Board expect to get the "Montagu" off the rocks; what ships are to be employed in bringing the floating dock from Bermuda for purposes of docking her; and whether the Board are still satisfied, in view of the strains to which the ship has been subjected, that the expenditure on salving and repair will be justified.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The date cannot be given as it must necessarily be affected largely by the state of the weather. There has never been any intention of bringing home the dock named for the purpose indicated. The reply to the last part of the Question is in the affirmative.

Commutation of Army Pensions.

MR. BARKER (Penryn and Falmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, while a retired commissioned officer may commute part of his pension as early as forty years of age, and a pensioned non-commissioned officer or man at fifty, a retired warrant officer is debarred this privilege until he attains the age of fifty-five; and whether, in view of the fact that non-commissioned officers and warrant officers on returning to civil life are often seriously handicapped for want of means to make a start in business for themselves, he will cause the regulation regarding the commutation of pensions to be amended.

THE SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): Some relaxation has recently been allowed in regard to the age at which retired officers are permitted to commute a portion of their retired pay, and I should like to make a somewhat similar concession in the case of retired warrant and non-commissioned officers and soldiers, where commutation was clearly to their advantage. The subject of commutation generally, however, is not altogether free from difficulty, and at present I can only say that I have it under my consideration.

3rd Infantry Brigade, Aldershot—D. Bremner's Deferred Pay.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of D. Bremner, late corporal in charge of the Medical Inspection Room, 3rd Infantry Brigade, Aldershot, who was discharged from the Army on February 6th, 1906, after twenty-four and a half years service, without receiving the deferred pay to which he became entitled on his discharge; whether he is aware that Bremner's deferred pay was withheld from him upon the alleged ground that he was only a private and had improperly drawn corporal's pay from November 1st, 1902 until January 31st, 1906; and whether, seeing that Bremner was appointed corporal by the colonel commanding the 42nd Regimental District in July, 1901, and thereafter until the date of his discharge continuously performed corporal's duties and was allowed to wear corporal's uniform, and in view of the fact that his pay as corporal was always passed by the Pay Office, he will state what justification exists for withholding the sum due.

MR. HALDANE: This case was decided locally in the Aldershot Command, and I am having inquiries made about it.

Training of Irish Army Candidates.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that owing to the absence of Volunteer regiments in Ireland in which Army candidates from the universities could get military training, as they do in England and Scotland, provision was made more than a year ago whereby Irish candidates were nominally gazetted to Militia regiments without being required to join them; that further regulations were made whereby applications were made by the colonels of such Militia regiments to the commanding officers of Regular regiments for the admission of such candidates to training with the Regulars, and that this was done without trouble to the candidates or universities, and has worked well for the last eighteen months; will he explain why this arrangement has been upset by the War Office authorities, who now require Irish Army candidates to sign and fill up forms necessary in the case of those who purpose joining the Militia, involving details and certificates, baptismal and otherwise, with medical certificates, and involving expense for no useful purpose, as these forms, or analogous ones, must be afterwards filled and sent in before admission to the Army; and will he do away with these details, and revert to the arrangements which were approved of by the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, and which have hitherto worked well.

MR. HALDANE: The facts of the case are not accurately stated. Formerly a university candidate had first to become a Militia officer and then to apply through his Militia, Yeomanry, or Volunteer commanding officer to be attached to a Regular unit. In order to save him the trouble of applying through several authorities, and largely on account of the representations of the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, arrangements were made whereby, if not already holding a commission in the Auxiliary Forces, he could apply through his university authorities direct to the War Office—(a) to be given a commission on the Unattached List of the Auxiliary Forces, and (b) to be attached to a Regular unit. On receipt of such application all further arrangements are made by the War Office. This arrangement was made by the War Office, not by the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, who has no authority to make such arrangements. It applies equally to all universities whether in Ireland or elsewhere. The present procedure is thus the simplest that could be devised. To fill in a simple form is a small matter for a gentleman who desires the honour of receiving His Majesty's Commission in the Auxiliary Forces, with a view to being attached to, and commanding men in, a Regular unit, and subsequently obtaining a commission in a Regular unit. A medical certificate of fitness is always required before a commission is given in the Auxiliary Forces. This certificate may save a candidate, who would be rejected by the final Medical Board, from subsequent disappointment, and from the expense of attachment.

Army Nursing Service.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he proposes to make reductions in the Queen Alexandra's Imperial Military Nursing Service, seeing that the numbers employed in military hospitals are far in excess of the requirements of the sick, and that much public money could be thereby saved.

MR. HALDANE: The establishment of the Queen Alexandra's Imperial Military Nursing Service was fixed to provide for the efficient nursing of the sick in military hospitals at home and abroad, and to establish in connection with these hospitals nurse training schools for the men of the Royal Army Medical Corps. Increased responsibilities in both respects have been delegated to the nursing service. The distribution of the staffs has been decided upon by the civil matrons of the Nursing Board, and all matters relating to Army nursing form the subjects of recommendation by that Board, and is not, in the opinion of my expert advisers, in excess of the requirements. It must be remembered that the standards of the medical care and treatment which are requisite for the sick have risen during the last few years, and that the improvement is resulting not only in more humane methods, but in a saving of public money which is not less substantial because it is indirect.

Cason Mine Manager.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Jamieson, compound manager of the Cason mine, was charged at Boksburg Court on the 25th instant with flogging a Chinaman; that Thomas Radcliffe, who was the chief witness, swore that Jamieson administered twenty-five blows with great cruelty, rendering the victim unable to work; that the coolie said he received only one slight blow, and that his evidence was corroborated by other coolies; whether he has official information showing that the magistrate said that the charge brought by Radcliffe was gross perjury, and the case concocted by him; and, seeing that Mr. Jamieson was discharged and Radcliffe arrested in court for perjury and removed to gaol, he will state by whose authority the prosecution of Mr. Jamieson was authorised.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N. W.); I have already informed the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth in reply to a Question on Thursday last† that a report upon the case has been called for by telegraph and will reach us by mail.

*SIR JOHN KENNAWAY: And will the hon. Gentleman inquire who forwarded Radcliffe's affidavit to the authorities?

*MR. CHURCHILL: Yes.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing that in the case of Mr. Jamieson, charged at the Boksburg Court on June 25th, the magistrate said that the witness Radcliffe had committed perjury, and that he ought to be prosecuted; and whether, if that is so, it is intended to proceed against this witness for perjury.

*MR. CHURCHILL: No official information has yet been received, but a telegram has been sent asking for particulars.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Will the hon. Gentleman make some inquiry into the career of this Radcliffe in this country? Did he not offer his services to each Partv alike at the last General Election either to support or condemn Chinese Labour?

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Radcliffe has personally stated to Members of this House that that statement about him is absolutely false?

SIR GILBERT PARKER: It is absolutely true.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: It is not.

*MR. CHURCHILL: It would be most improper for me to pronounce any opinion on the character of the man whose name has been mentioned.

Ceylon Pearl Fisheries.

MR. MENZIES (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies seeing that the profits of the Ceylon Government Pearl Fisheries were £150,000 for last year, and that Professor Herdmann believed that the amount of profit would be very large in future years, why the Government accepted £20,666 rental per annum for a lease of twenty years without asking or advertising for tenders.

*MR. CHURCHILL: I can only refer the hon. Member to the replies which I have recently given to similar Questions in the House, and in which I have stated what I understand to be the reasons that actuated the late Government in the course which they adopted.

MR. MENZIES: Does the hon. Gentleman consider an adequate consideration is given in rental?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now asking as to a matter of opinion.

MR. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies in view of the fact that, after the close of the 1905 season, the Ceylon Government Pearl Fisheries were leased to a private company for twenty years at a rent equivalent to £20,666 a year, how that annual rent compares with the annual revenue derived by the Ceylon Government from these pearl fisheries in the years 1903, 1904, and 1905, respectively; and what was the amount of that revenue for each of those three years.

MR. CHURCHILL: It is impossible to state the exact figures from the information available here, but, as nearly as I can estimate them, the net receipts were, in 1903 Rs. 630,000 (£42,000), in 1904 Rs. 915,000 (£61,000), and in 1905 Rs. 2,300,000 (£153,300). I am bound to add that the results of these three years, in each of which there was a successful, and in the last a record fishery, do not of themselves afford a basis for computing what would be a fair rental, and that the rent payable by the company under their lease is roughly the average net revenue obtained over a period of twenty years including and ending with 1905, during which there were twelve years in which the fishery failed altogether.

MR. J. D. WHITE: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Professor Herdmann, the expert, has expressed an opinion that as things stand now——

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

Native Labour for the Transvaal Mines.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a statement, recently published in Johannesburg by the Transvaal Mines Labour Company, that an adequate supply of Native labour could be obtained so as to gradually rid the Colony of Chinese labour, that the company had a well-planned organisation, and had secured the services of men thoroughly familiar with recruiting work in South Africa, that it was prepared to supply at once, as a first instalment, 5,000 Kaffirs for the mines, and also to deposit £5,000 as security for the due performance of the contract; and whether, under these circumstances, His Majesty's Government will take all such measures as may be necessary under the terms of the modus vivendi between this Country and Portugal to remove the interdict which has been placed by the Portuguese authorities upon the recruiting of Native labour on the East Coast of Africa by any other persons than those employed by the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association.

MR. CHURCHILL: I have seen a statement to this effect. I would refer my hon. friend to my Answer to a Question by the hon. Member for Chester on June 18th,† as well as to the speech of Secretary of State made in another place on Friday last, wherein it has been made clear that His Majesty's Government are willing to permit and facilitate the recruiting of Kaffirs by other bodies besides the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association provided that their reputation and responsibility are established. Communications are even now proceeding in that intention both with Lord Selborne and with the Foreign Office.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Does the hon. Gentleman intend to exclude private recruiting? Is he acquainted with the character of the Transvaal Labour Mines Company?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir. I have a good deal of information about that. It is not the intention of the Government to re-institute open recruiting, but we are prepared to secure equal treatment for every responsible body.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): May I ask if, in carrying out this policy, the Government will bear in mind the fact that recruiting in Tropical Central Africa is exceedingly fatal to the coolies who go to the Rand and of very little advantage to the mining industry?

MR. CHURCHILL: I have every reason to believe that it will be discontinued.

The Repatriated Chinese Coolies.

MR. LONSDALE, (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the twelve coolies who have applied for repatriation have been returned to China, and, if not, whether the Government will consider the desirability of commissioning them to explain to their compatriots in the mines the new proposals for inducing coolies to embrace the means of escape from their present condition.

MR. CHURCHILL: As these coolies have already returned to China my honourable friend's solicitude is too late.

Military Operations in Nigeria.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any information as to recent military operations against natives in Nigeria; and whether the unrest is due to the circulation of seditious matter among the Mussulman population.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has received full reports from Sir Frederic Lugard as to the recent military operations near Sokoto and at Hadeija in Northern Nigeria. There is no reason to suppose that the hostile attitude of certain sections of the Mussulman population was due to the circulation of seditious matter. No other military operations have taken place recently in parts of Nigeria where the population is Mussulman.

South African Import Duties.

MR. STUART SAMUEL (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that under the Provisional South African Customs Union Convention, it is proposed to tax second-hand clothing, largely exported from the East End of London, to the extent of from 150 to 400 per cent. as compared with a present charge of 10 per cent. ad valorem, less a preferential rebate of 2½ per cent.; and if he will represent in the proper quarter the desirability of a reduction in this duty.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State is aware that the duty has been increased from 10 per cent. ad valorem less a preferential rebate of 2½ per cent. to 2s. for each article of clothing. As the provisional convention has now been ratified by the Colonial legislatures, I do not consider that the requested representation would be likely to serve any useful purpose.

The Court Martial on Natal Natives.

MR. MACKARNESS: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, as soon as the rebellion in Natal is over, His Majesty's Government will remove their objection to the publication of the evidence upon which twelve British subjects were recently convicted of a capital offence and executed.

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir; it will be both convenient and desirable to publish the evidence in question when the present period of danger and unrest shall have ended.

Shanghai Administration.

Mr. D. DAVIES (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps he proposes to take for the reorganisation of the administration of Shanghai: whether in view of the refusal on the part of the Chinese authorities to come to an agreement with the representatives of England, Germany, and the United States as to the procedure of the Mixed Court, he will inform the House if the assessors are exclusively bound by the Regulations of 1869; and whether practice and precedent settled since that date are to be entirely ignored.

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir Edward Grey, Northumberland Berwick): No steps for the reorganisation of the administration of the International Settlement at Shanghai are in contemplation. It would not be correct to say that the Chinese Authorities have refused to come to an agreement as to the procedure of the Mixed Court. Negotiations are proceeding as to the proposed amendments to the Court rules, and although no final result has been attained, we understand that considerable progress has been made. Meanwhile, I am informed that the Mixed Court is being administered as hitherto in accordance with practice and precedent.

The Denshawi Executions.

Mr. REDDY (King's County, Birr): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that whilst one of the Egyptian natives was being hanged at Denshawi, on June 28th, two others were flogged within view of the gallows; that a large multitude, including women, were looking on; and that the flogging caused horrible cries; and will he say whether the sentences were carried out under the supervision of Captain Machell, adviser to the Egyptian Minister of the Interior; and is Captain Machell a British officer.

Sir EDWARD GREY: In consequence of the statement which has appeared in the Press, I have asked for a full Report of how the sentences were carried out, with special reference to the points named in this and other Questions. Meanwhile, I cannot say anything as to who was primarily responsible for carrying out the sentences.

Mr. REDDY: Will that brute Machell be kept in the service?

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked if the Answer applied to all the Questions on this subject.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I have, as a matter of fact, prepared Answers which give some pieces of information, but practically my Answer covers all the Questions.

Mr. REDDY: Are you going to cloak this man? You talk about the Congo horrors.

Mr. MYER (Lambeth, N.): Are the reports in the Press substantially true?

Sir EDWARD GREY: I have asked for a full Report of all the circumstances of the case. I may say I assume there can be only one impression produced by the details as they appeared in the newspapers, and I think it most desirable instead of dealing with the matter piecemeal we should have the full Report. When that Report has been received I shall be prepared to lay it before the House.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked if the information would be sent by cable.

Sir EDWARD GREY: Considering the number of points raised, it is thought best to have a Report sent by Mail.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked if the Report would be received before the Foreign Office Vote would be taken.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I do not think it is possible to have it by Thursday.

Mr. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of having the Vote postponed or the Report sent by telegraph? It would be unfair to deny the House the only opportunity for considering the Report.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I recognise the importance of the matter, but I think there are other questions of importance not connected with this for discussion on the Vote. My object is to give full information, and when I have laid Papers before the House opportunity will be found for discussion.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): We want the opportunity to compare the Congo administration with our administration in other parts of Africa.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any official information showing that the late Captain Bull, whose death followed on the recent affray at Denshawi, really died of heat apoplexy.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have no information as to the precise cause of death. This is a point which will no doubt appear in the evidence for which I have already asked.

MR. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the hanging of certain natives, and the flogging of certain other natives, at Denshawi on June 28th, were of a public character; whether some hundreds of natives, men and women, were present as spectators; and, if so, whether steps will be taken to have the execution of any such sentences in Egypt conducted in accordance with the usage of civilised nations.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The sentences were ordered to be carried out in public on the scene of the outrage. When I have received the full report, the question of whether such executions should take place in public will be considered.

MR. DILLON asked whether the proceedings were arranged with the approval of the British Consul and Agent-General; if so, were they approved of by His Majesty's Government; and whether any official attempt had been made to induce any of the London Press to abstain from publishing any of these details.

SIR EDWARD GREY: These points are covered by the Answer I have read. I have no information, but the points have been noted, and will be specially dealt with in the Report on the whole proceedings for which I have already asked. Papers will be laid before the House when the full Report is received. I am not aware of any attempt, official or unofficial, to influence the Press in this matter in any way.

MR. DILLON: Some of us will endeavour to raise the subject on Thursday.

Chinese Customs.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps are being taken to ensure that the assurances given by the Wai-wu-pu, that no change is contemplated in the method of administering the Chinese Customs, will be officially promulgated for the instruction of all who are engaged in the department.

SIR EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Charge d'Affaires at Peking reported on June 16th that the offices of the new Administrator would be ready in three weeks, when instructions would be issued to Sir R. Hart to continue as before. These instructions would be in accord with the assurances received by His Majesty's Government, and being issued officially would be public.

Bahr-el-Ghazal.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the evacuation of the Sudanese Bahr-el-Ghazal by Congolese troops, in accordance with the Anglo-Belgian Convention, will take effect.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The five posts in the Bahr-el-Ghazal occupied by Congolese troops should have been evacuated as soon as possible after the signature of the agreement. But in such remote districts, a certain delay in sending instructions and in carrying them out is unavoidable.

LORD TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): How long since should the evacuation have taken place? What has been the extent of the delay?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I can hardly tell. It necessarily takes time to reach these remote places.

Unrest in the Euphrates Valley.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has received information of the murder of several British subjects recently in the vilayets of Baghdad and Basr; and what steps are being taken to restore order in that area, and protect the lives and property of British subjects.

SIR E. GREY: His Majesty's Government have received information of the murder of one British subject, Mr. Glanville, at Maghil, and His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople is giving every attention to the matter. A special Commission is being despatched by the Ottoman Government to concert such measures as are required for the maintenance of order.

The Aland Islands.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the occupation of the Aland Islands, in the Baltic, by Russian troops, while Russian warships remain in the immediate vicinity, has caused alarm in Sweden; and whether it is intended to ask the Russian Government for explanations of their action, in view of the engagements of Russia as to these islands in the Treaty of Paris.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the negative. As regards the second part, I have nothing to add to the reply given on June 28th to the hon. Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire.†

The Algeciras Protocol.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether in ratifying the Algeciras protocol the Sultan of Morocco has made any reservations or conditions; and, if so, whether he can communicate the nature of such conditions to the House?

SIR EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Government have not yet received the formal notification of the Sultan's accession to the Algeciras Act; but according to a Report received from His Majesty's Minister at Tangier, the Sultan has acceded without making any reservation.

Vaccination Exemption Certificates—Captain Gravener, J.P.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Captain Gravener, who said he would not give certificates of exemption from vaccination, is still a magistrate; if his attention has been called to Dr. Tinker, a magistrate sitting on the Hyde bench, who declared on June 25th, 1906 a conscientious objection to give certificates of exemption from vaccination; and if he will take any steps to enforce the Law.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I am informed that Captain Gravener stated that he would not sit when application for certificates of exemption were under consideration. When the matter was first brought to my notice I sent the Papers to the Lord Chancellor, and there is no further action for me to take in the matter. I have made inquiry into the case at Hyde referred to by my hon. friend, and I find that after some conversation with the applicant Dr. Tinker withdrew from the Bench and the applicant was told to come again when two other justices were present. Dr. Tinker does not refuse to carry out the law. These cases and others to which my attention is constantly being drawn illustrate the chronic friction which is caused by the present state of the law with regard to exemption certificates.

Anarchist Writings.

SIR W. EVANS-GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that one Johann Most was in June, 1881, sentenced by the Lord Chief Justice to sixteen months hard labour, for having published a libel against the Emperor Alexander II., for having extolled the assassination of that monarch as a triumph of revolutionary justice, and for having encouraged divers persons to murder other potentates in Europe out of Her Majesty's dominions: and that, in returning a true Bill against Most, the grand jury recorded their unanimous opinion that the publication in this country of excitements to the assassination of foreign rulers should be vigorously dealt with; and, if so, will he explain why no action has yet been taken against those persons who expressed regret at the failure of the recent attempt against the life of the King of Spain; and does he contemplate taking any, and, if any, what action.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am well aware of the facts of the case of Johann Most. The article which formed the basis of the prosecution in that case referred in terms of exultation to the murder of the Emperor of Russia and contained incitements, in the clearest language, to the murder of other rulers. The articles to which my attention was drawn, though containing most objectionable matter, were so written as not to bring the writers within the law. They do not express regret for the failure of the attempt to murder the King of Spain, nor do they contain definite incitement to further murder. I am advised that any attempt to prosecute would serve no purpose but to advertise the mischievous article. My attention, however, has just been called to a further article in another publication which is under my consideration.

Vivisection.

*SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to an advertisement of the National Canine Defence League, alleging that a collie dog, afterwards claimed by a doctor, recently took refuge in a shop in Gower Street with its throat cut and suffering terribly; and whether he has directed any inquiries to be made in the matter, and, if so, with what result.

*MR. GLADSTONE: It appears from the statement of the shopkeeper that the incident occurred four years ago, and not recently, as might have been supposed from the statements in the papers, and that the dog was claimed by a porter at University College, who was well known to the shopkeeper, and not by a doctor, as alleged. The condition of the dog's neck could not be seen, because it was bandaged; but some tubing is stated to have been hanging from the bandage. The porter died some time ago. No further information appears to be available.

Caradoc Mine Disaster.

COLONEL HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the recent disaster at the Caradoc mine, Gilfach Goch, whether, as required by the Mines Act, a plan of the disused workings of that mine was deposited at the Home Office when working was temporarily suspended; what guarantee the Home Office has of the accuracy of such plans; and whether, having regard to the danger of flooding in collieries that have been partially disused, he will direct that special inquiry be made with reference to the working plans of the colliery in question.

*MR. GLADSTONE: A plan was deposited at the Home Office of the workings in the Ty Du seam at this colliery which were abandoned in September, 1904. The accuracy of the plan was certified by a surveyor approved by the inspector for the district, as required by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1896. Inquiry is being made by the inspector as to the accuracy of the working plans of this colliery.

British Railway Rates for Timber.

MR. D. DAVIES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the higher rates charged by British railway companies for the carriage of timber, as compared with Continental railways, and to the differentiation in rates which British railways make in favour of foreign timber; and what steps he proposes to take to remove the inequality which now exists.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): No specific complaints as to the railway rates on timber have recently been brought to the notice of the Board of Trade. If any particulars are furnished of preferential rates for foreign timber being granted the Board of Trade will be prepared to investigate the case.

Company Returns.

MR. BARRAN (Leeds, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that some limited companies have not filed Returns ordered under The Companies Act, 25 and 26

Vic., c. 89, part 2, since 1894, although bringing themselves under a penalty of £5 per day by failing to do so; and whether he will take steps to compel these companies to comply with the provisions of the Act.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The Board of Trade make every effort to enforce the regular filing with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies of all the returns ordered under the Companies Acts. I do not know of any cases of default such as those referred to by my hon. friend, but if he will give me any instance of which he has knowledge I will make enquiries.

MR. BARRAN: If I prove the general register is defective in some cases, will the right hon. Gentleman see that it is brought up to date as a whole?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will inquire into any cases brought to my notice.

MR. BARRAN: The right hon. Gentleman does not appreciate my point. I shall prove it is defective in some cases, and I want to know if the right hon. Gentleman will see that all defects are remedied.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will inquire.

Metropolitan District Railway.

MR. PAUL (Northampton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the frequent stoppages and delays of the electric trains on the Metropolitan District Railway; and whether the directors can by any means be induced to consult the convenience of the travelling public.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I would refer my hon. friend to the Answer on this subject which I gave on March 20th, to the noble Lord the Member for Maidstone.† Since that time I am glad to say that complaints have materially fallen off. I have no doubt that the railway company are fully alive to the desirability in their own interest as well as that of the public of putting an end as far as possible to the stoppages and delays referred to.

The Salisbury Railway Accident.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he had any fresh information as to the railway accident at Salisbury, and whether full inquiry would at once be instituted into the cause of the disaster.

MR. WARDLE (Stockport) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether in view of the large number of accidents which had recently occurred through engines jumping the rails when running at high speeds, and especially in view of the deplorable accident at Salisbury, he would cause special inquiries to be made regarding (1) the practice of running express trains at such high speeds (2), the state of the permanent ways, (3) the construction of the engines, and other cognate matters, with a view to the prevention of such accidents.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have not yet received any particulars beyond those which have appeared in the newspapers as to the appalling accident which took place yesterday. The inspecting officer of the Board of Trade has already proceeded to Salisbury, but I have not yet received his preliminary report. A formal inquiry will be held later on as to the causes of the accident, in the course of which the matters referred to by the hon. Member will be carefully investigated; but it would be premature to offer any opinion on them at the present moment. I may be permitted to add that this terrible accident has evoked the deepest sympathies of this House and of the nation with the friends and relatives of the victims of the accident, and with the injured survivors.

Commission on Lighting Coasts and Harbours.

MR. GEORGE GIBBS: I beg to ask the President to the Board of Trade when he will announce the names of the Committe or Commission to be appointed to examine the question of lighting coasts and harbours.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I hope shortly to be a position to announce the names of the Royal Commission proposed to be appointed to inquire into the constitution and administration of the general lighthouse authorities.

† See (4) Debates, cliv., 218.

Merchandise Marks.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the Report of the Select Committe of 1897 on the operation of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and to the unanimous recommendation that the definite words — made in———,— required by the 16th section of that Act, operated as a gratuitous advertisement of our foreign rivals in a particular country, and should be replaced either by the word imported or foreign; and, in such case, if the Government will introduce a short measure to give effect to such recommendation, or support the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Central Sheffield with that object.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am fully aware of the Report in question, but there is no intention of introducing amending legislation at present. Any Private Bill brought in to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee would receive the sympathetic consideration of His Majesty's Government.

Spotted Fever in Glasgow.

MR. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether repeated cases of spotted fever have occurred for some months in Glasgow; and, if so, whether he will consider the desirability of requiring that the disease shall be placed on the list of those for compulsory notification, not merely in Glasgow, but as a general order.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): The Infectious Diseases (Notification) Acts do not empower the Local Government Board to issue a general Order making a disease compulsorily notifiable, and I am advised that, under present circumstances, there would be no need for any such general Order as regards the particular disease referred to in the Question. With the approval of the Board, however, action for the purpose of making this disease notifiable may be taken by any sanitary authority in England and Wales (with which alone I am concerned), so far as relates to the district of the authority, and in August last the Board issued a circular to the several authorities, stating that they would be prepared to consider an application for their approval to an extension of the Act to the disease, should the sanitary authority desire, in view of any special circumstances, to make the necessary application. Some applications of the kind have since been made and approved.

Medical Officers of Health and Vaccination.

MR. LUPTON: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will treat the publication by a qualified medical man of an opinion adverse to vaccination as a bar to his appointment as medical officer of health, as was done in the Penge district council case in April, 1901; and, if the Answer be in the affirmative, will he state how he proposes to safeguard the free expression of scientific opinion by medical officers of health.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I could not give a general Answer on the point referred to in the first part of the Question. If it comes before me in any particular case, I shall be prepared to consider it.

Kentish Landowners as Land Grabbers.

MR. COX (Preston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the way in which landowners in various parts of the country, and especially in the county of Kent, are in the habit of annexing roadside strips; and whether he will take steps to call the attention of rural district councils to the matter, and to their duty under the law.

MR JOHN BURNS: I do not find that representations have been made to me on this subject, though I am aware that sometimes attempts to make encroachments of the kind referred to are made. I have not at present any reason to suppose that rural district councils are ignorant of their powers and duties in the matter, and in the absence of further information to show that such is the case, it does not seem to me necessary to call their attention to them.

Sale of Tinned Meats.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state what steps are being taken to prevent American tinned meats and foods, now in the hands of importers or wholesale dealers, from being relabelled and sold as British produce.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I would refer my hon. friend to Section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which prohibits the sale to the prejudice of the purchaser of any article of food which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by him, and also to the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, which make it an offence to apply a false trade description to any goods. A false trade description includes a false description as to the place or country in which the goods were produced, and the term "goods" includes anything which is the subject of trade.

Royal Commission on Motor Cars.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Royal Commission on the Motor Car Acts is likely to report.

MR. JOHN BURNS: As I stated on Friday in reply to a Question on this subject, I have every reason to believe that the Report will shortly be issued.

Hyndburn Park School, Accrington.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that plans for the Hyndburn Park School, Accrington, were approved by the Board of Education on condition that the school should be organised in three departments under separate head teachers; that the local education authority desire to depart from these conditions, and to arrange for one large department for 740 children; that on 17th May last the board refused to consent to this modification on the ground that such a department would be large and unwieldy, that effective supervision would be impossible, and that the head teacher could have no possible knowledge of the children under his charge; and whether the Board of Education now propose to depart from the principles expressed in that letter, and, if so, on what grounds.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The facts named in the Question are, so far as I am aware, accurately stated. The matter is having my careful attention, and a letter will be sent shortly to the local authority explaining the views of the board in regard to it and to the principles it involves. The board do not propose to depart from their general principles. As regards the particular instance under consideration, the number of children in attendance will not, at all events for some considerable time, reach the number referred to in the Question, which is certainly larger than can properly be supervised by one head teacher in the proper sense of the term.

School Buildings Maintenance.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the trustees or managers or the local authority will be responsible for the wear and tear and structural upkeep of the fabric of the State-aided and non-rate-aided schools contemplated in the amended form of Clause 4 of the Education Bill.

MR. BIRRELL: The cost will not fall upon the local education authority.

Teachers' Religious Tests.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether it will be competent in the new class of state-aided and non-rate-aided schools contemplated under the amended form of Clause 4 of the Education Bill for the managers to apply a religious test to the teachers in such schools upon appointment.

MR. BIRRELL: The appointment of the teachers in the schools referred to in Question, which I hope will be but few in number, will not be in the hands of the local education authorities, as the schools will in no way be maintained by those authorities. Therefore the conditions in respect of the appointment of teachers which are laid down in the Education Bill as applicable to schools maintained by local authorities will not apply.

DR. MACNAMARA asked whether the right hon. Gentleman contemplated the imposition of a religious test in such cases.

MR. BIRRELL: I am afraid I cannot exercise any control over that matter.

Teachers' Appointments and Dismissals.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the local education authority will continue to have the powers of veto over the appointment and dismissal of teachers, conferred by the Education Act of 1902, in the case of the new class of State-aided and non-rated schools contemplated in the amended form of Clause 4 of the Education Bill.

MR. BIRRELL: The Answer is in the negative.

The Conscience Clause.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the parents of children attending the State-aided and non-rate-aided schools contemplated in the amended form of Clause 4 of the Education Bill will, as matters now stand, be able to claim for their children the protection of the Conscience Clause.

MR. BIRRELL: The Conscience Clause will certainly apply to the schools referred to in the Question.

Religious Instruction.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education does any syllabus of Bible teaching state whether it is the seventh day or the first day of the week that was commanded to be kept holy; if not, can he say how the ordinance as to Sunday observance is explained to children under the Cowper-Temple system; and will he make accessible to Members of the House any syllabus of Bible teaching in which the abandonment of the observance of the commandment as to the Sabbath day and the keeping of Sunday as the day of rest and reverence is explained or justified.

MR. BIRRELL: The Board of Education are not responsible for the religious instruction given in council or voluntary schools. I have no information in regard to the matter referred to in the hon. Member's Question beyond that, if any, which may be contained in the Parliamentary Return recently issued.

Education Bill—Clause 8.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if, in consequence of his new Clause 3 to the Education Bill, he proposes to omit Clauses 8 and any clause consequential to it.

MR. BIRRELL: The Government's action in regard to Clause 8 depends entirely upon the view taken by the Opposition of the new clause as to bilateral compulsion referred to by the hon. Member. If it is accepted by them, no doubt most of the provisions of Clause 8, and the clause as it now stands, will become inapplicable to the new position thus created, and would therefore have to be materially modified, if not omitted. I can thus give no answer as to the course to be taken when Clause 8 comes before the Committee for consideration, until the Leader of the Opposition has intimated the line that will be adopted in respect to the new clause. It must clearly be understood that the new clause has been put upon the Paper only to carry out the offer made by me on June 12th† to the Opposition, and must not be taken as representing the Government's intentions in regard to the matter in the event of that offer not being accepted.

MR. DILLON: What opportunity is going to be given to us to indicate our attitude towards the new clause before we reach Clause 8?

MR. BIRRELL: If no intimation has been given to us, we must proceed with Clause 8 as it now stands in the Bill.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): Are we to understand that it is at the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition whether or not the new clause is to supersede Clause 8?

MR. BIRRELL: The Government have no desire whatever to thrust the new clause upon the House. It was given in answer to a proposal put from the other side, and it was an offer on my part in answer to theirs. If therefore, it is not accepted, we shall proceed with Clause 8 as it stands in the Bill.

† See (4) Debates clviii., 839.

MR. T. M. HEALY: With a view to enabling us to discuss these later clauses, would the right hon. Gentleman make a few of us peers?

MR. BIRRELL: Nothing would give me greater gratification than to see the hon. and learned Member in another place.

Education Bill—Clause 4.

COLONEL WALKER (Lancashire, Widnes): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether it will not be incumbent upon the applicants for extended facilities to show at the public inquiry that there is alternative school accommodation for all children whose parents do not desire the facilities within the meaning of paragraph (b) of Subsection (1) of Clause 4 of the Education Bill; and, if so, how the applicants are to get the names of those parents in time for making the necessary inquiries or at all; and whether the production and publication of those names is consistent with the secrecy of the ballot.

MR. BIRRELL: The ultimate effect of Clause 4 will be as follows: The ballot will determine whether or not paragraph (a) of the clause is complied with, i. e., whether the requisite 80 per cent. of children desire the extended facilities, and will consequently show at the same time the number of school-places (not the actual individual children) which may possibly be required in other schools under paragraph (b) of the clause. It will then rest with the public inquiry to determine whether this full number of school-places in other schools will actually be required, or whether any deduction is to be made from that number in respect of children whose parents were unable to vote at the ballot and who do not require that other accommodation. It is obvious, therefore, that there will be no occasion whatever to infringe the secrecy of the ballot, or to ascertain in what way any particular parents may have voted.

British Mails by German Liners.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN (Galway): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will state how often during the last fiscal year His Majesty's mails were despatched by steamers of German lines calling at Southampton to the United States; what was the total sum paid to such companies during that period for the carriage of the mails; and will he say whether British steamers were available for this purpose.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): During the last financial year there were six occasions on which German packets calling at Southampton on their voyage to the United States were used for the conveyance of British mails not consisting exclusively of specially addressed correspondence. No direct payment is made to the steamship company in such cases. The use of foreign packets is a matter for adjustment on the basis of periodical statistics with the Government which pays the subsidy. On the occasions in question no British steamers of sufficient speed were available for the conveyance of the mails.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN: Is no money paid?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The liners are subsidised by the German Government and it is a matter of arrangement with the German Post Office.

Charing Cross Improvement.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it has been decided that the removal of the premises now occupied in Charing Cross and Spring Gardens by the Phœnix Fire Office, the Union Assurance Company, the Liverpool, London and Globe Insurance Company, the Architects' Department of the London County Council, Messrs. Hobgood and Dowson, is necessary to complete the opening of the Mall to Charing Cross; and, if so, when the buildings were purchased, and by whom, and if not purchased when they will be purchased, and by whom.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, N.E., Rossendale): I have not heard of any decision such as the hon. Member suggests; nor do I know whether the owners of these houses wish to sell them, or to whom.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether he proposes to take any legislative power?

*MR. HARCOURT: No, Sir.

Skye Medical Officer.

MR. JOHN DEWAR (Inverness): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he is aware that at Uig, in Skye, on the estate of the Congested Districts Board, there is no proper residence for the medical officer, and that, in consequence, there is difficulty in retaining the services of a doctor in the district; and will he use his influence with the Congested Districts Board to induce them to put one of the houses belonging to them at Uig at the disposal of the medical officer.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The responsibility of the Congested Districts Board in this matter is simply that of any other landlord in the district, and at present I regret to say that there is no prospect of their being able to provide such a house. But I am aware that this is a real difficulty. To enable this parish council to meet it, legislation will be necessary and I will consider whether or not steps should be taken in this direction.

Marine Biological Station, Millport.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that there is a prospect of the teachers' classes at the Marine Biological Station at Millport being cancelled because of the action of the Glasgow and South Western and Caledonian Railways in withdrawing their steamers; and whether he will take instant action to prevent the loss of this useful educational work.

MR. SINCLAIR: The Department has received no communication on the subject from the managers of the Marine Biological Station, and they have no reason to suppose that there is any prospect of the teachers' classes at present conducted there being discontinued.

Protection of Scottish Fisheries.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the quantity of line-caught fish landed in Scotland during the year 1905 was 50 per cent. less than ten years ago; and, seeing that this decline is attributable to the fishing beds being injured through illegal trawling, will he state when he proposes to provide the Fishery Board with another cruiser for sea police service.

MR. SINCLAIR: I am aware that there has been a great decrease in the quantity of line-caught fish in Scotland during recent years, but the decline may be attributable to other causes besides that referred to by the hon. Member. The funds at the disposal of the Fishery Board are not yet sufficient for the purchase of another cruiser.

Moray Firth Fishing Banks.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the last Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland shows that, during the year 1905, the fishing banks of the Moray Firth again proved unproductive; and seeing that this is attributed to the action of foreign trawlers, will he state what progress is being made with the Moray Firth trawling appeal.

MR. SINCLAIR: I have no information as to the date upon which the decision of the Court of Justiciary will be given.

Scottish Congested Districts Settlers.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland, in view of the fact that the last Report of the Congested Districts Board shows that the Board have assisted in settling 1,150 persons on the land, will he state how many of these persons are feuars or in process of becoming proprietors, and how many crofters under the Act.

MR. SINCLAIR: The 1,150 settlers brought out in the statement at page 27 of the Appendix of Congested Districts

Board eighth Report may be divided thus:—

1.	Feuars (Battery Park, Stornoway)	29
2.	Proprietors subject to annuity	730
3.	Crofters under the Acts	261
4.	Leaseholders (Borve and Symbister)	130

Crofters' Building Loans.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state in how many instances the Congested Districts Board have advanced money to crofters to enable them to rebuild their houses; and what security does the Board take in such cases for the recovery of the money advanced.

MR. SINCLAIR: The Board have made loans in ninety-four instances to enable crofters to build houses on new crofts formed by proprietors by the subdivision of farms with aid from the Board. The security is the bond prescribed by Section 6 of the Board's Act

Irish Lights Board.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that there are no members of Irish Harbour Boards on the Irish Lights Board; and what steps he proposes taking to remedy this omission.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): Pending the proposed inquiry by a Royal Commission into the constitution of the General Lighthouse Authorities, I am not prepared to take any steps with respect to the Irish Lights Board, whose constitution can only be altered by Act of Parliament.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): When will the Royal Commission hold its first sitting?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I hope it will be appointed in the course of a few days.

Tralee Post Office.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General when it is intended to start building the post office in Tralee.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The plans have now been settled, and it is hoped that the Board of Public Works will soon be able to make arrangements for commencing the building.

Trawling.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that the last Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland shows that the line fishing industry has declined 50 per cent. within the last ten years, and that this decline is due to the depredations of illegal trawlers, will he state whether he can see his way to grant facilities for the further consideration of the Trawlers' Certificates Suspension Bill.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): No, Sir, I am afraid I cannot see my way to granting facilities for this Bill.

MR. WEIR: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this Bill is unopposed with the exception of one Member of the Opposition who is interested in trawlers—and trawlers only—and does he know it would prove of great service to line fishermen all around the coasts? Will he, therefore, not reconsider his decision?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I should be glad to see proper time given for the discussion of this Bill, but although my hon. friend discerns only one opponent I am aware that granting of facilities would immediately produce more than one.

Jewish Massacres in Russia.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that both Houses of the United States Congress have passed a Resolution expressing the horror of the people at the massacre of Hebrews in Russia; and whether His Majesty's Government propose to give an opportunity to this House of recording its opinion on this subject.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The recent events in Russia, to which the hon. Member calls attention, have, as he is aware, aroused the strongest feeling in this House and throughout the country. I am not at all sure that the adoption of the unusual course suggested by the hon. Member of giving formal expression to those sentiments would serve any useful purpose, or that it might not even add to the difficulties in Russia itself.

Punishments in Public.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if, in view of the demoralising effect of public executions and floggings, and their long abandonment in the United Kingdom, he will order their discontinuance in all countries directly or indirectly under the flag of the British Empire.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I will consult my colleagues as to the extent, which I believe to be very limited, to which public executions and floggings take place, and consider whether any steps can be taken.

Wireless Telegraphy Bill.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to take into consideration the Lords' Amendments to the Wireless Telegraphy Bill.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot fix a day at present.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: Will notice be given before the Bill is taken?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Notice must be given.

Public Rights of Way.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the unsatisfactory state of the law affecting the law of evidence as regards the proof of public rights of way, and of the uncertainty with which juries treat such evidence, which makes the expense of proof of a right of way very onerous on local authorities, and almost impossible for the public to establish rights of way to mountain tops, places of historic interest, and the sea-shore, notwithstanding that the public have had uninterrupted use of such rights of way for very many years, His Majesty's Government are prepared to introduce a Bill to amend the law, and so afford greater protection to the public interest.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I should be very glad to see the law affecting rights of way put on a clear and satisfactory footing, but, of course, at this stage of the session I can say nothing about introducing legislation on the subject. If I were entitled to put a Question to my hon. friend I should be tempted to ask him why the Bill which was backed by him and which aimed at securing the objects which he has at heart has, within the last few days, been dropped.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): With reference to that measure, for which I was responsible, I should like to say the Bill was withdrawn in consequence of opposition which it was impossible to overcome on this side of the House.

Mr. Justice Grantham.

MR. ARKWRIGHT (Hereford): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the memorial, in compliance with which he has given a day for the Motion of the hon. Member for South Donegal, in regard to the conduct of Mr. Justice Grantham.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The terms of the memorial were hardly intended for public purposes; but even if no such memorial had been presented it would not have been easy to refuse an opportunity for discussing the Motion in question.

Education Bill—Personnel of Commission.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he can now state the personnel of the Commission to be appointed under the Education Bill.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir, I cannot give the hon. Member the names to-day.

Government Contracts—Fair Wage Clause.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the fair wage clause in Government contracts now fails to meet the changed circumstances, he will appoint a Select Committee to go into the matter, with the view of recommending an alteration of the clause, making trade union wages and conditions of employment the standard of fairness in all Government contracts.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is the earnest desire of the Government to give full practical effect to the purpose underlying the Fair Wage Clause. The question what further clauses, if any, are necessary to fulfil this object in the diverse circumstances of the numerous Government contracts is receiving the careful consideration of the Departments concerned. The present moment does not therefore seem to me opportune for the appointment of the suggested Select Committee.

Colonial Independence.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to a debate in the Canadian Senate, on the 27th instant, in the course of which Senator Ellis declared that there is proceeding in Canada a movement which is rapidly making for absolute national independence; and on what course of policy do the Government rely to counteract such a movement towards disintegration, not only in Canada, but also in other parts of His Majesty's dominions.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am rather surprised at this Question looking to the quarter from which it comes. The feeling in Canada, as well as in other Colonies, is well known, and it tends not towards disintegration, but to closer union. And I advise the hon. Member not to be frightened by the speeches of Senator Ellis or anyone else.

COAST EROSION COMMISSION.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Can the Prime Minister now state the names of the Commission on Sea Erosion?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Royal Commission on Coast Erosion will be constituted as follows:—The Hon. Ivor C. Guest, M.P. (Chairman), Sir William H. Browne-ffolkes, Sir Leonard Lyell, Mr. William Matthews, C.M.G., Mr. W. P. Beale, K.C., M.P., Commander G. C. Frederick, R.N., Mr. H. Rider Haggard, Professor T. J. Jehu (St. Andrew's University), Mr. A. L. Lever, M.P., Mr. R. B. Nicholson (town clerk of Lowestoft), Mr. Patrick O'Brien, M.P., Mr. T. Summerbell, M.P., and Mr. A. Stanley Wilson, M.P.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES.)

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Law and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, in respect of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Bill: Mr. Henderson; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Barnes.

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 6:—

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) submitted that it was not in order to discuss this clause, inasmuch as the Committee had already come to a decision in a contrary sense, when on Clause 1 they decided that religious instruction should not be given outside the school hours. This clause put religious instruction outside compulsory attendance, and therefore outside the school hours.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that even if the hon. Member were correct about Clause 1 he had given the Answer to his own Question, which was that Clause 6 dealt with attendance, whereas the Amendments on Clause 1 dealt with religious instruction. He did not think the Question submitted by the hon. Member arose.

*MR. WALTERS (Sheffield, Brightside) said that the object of the Amendment standing in his name and of consequential Amendments was that the children should attend the schoolhouse during the whole time that it was used as a public elementary school. If parents objected to their children receiving religious instruction, provision should be made for secular instruction to be given in school hours in lieu of religious instruction. He said quite frankly that he approached this matter not so much from a religious as from an educational standpoint. He regarded the question more from the side of school efficiency and school discipline; and he was very much afraid that, in all the ingenious balancing of denominations, they would forget that the principal object of the schoolhouse was to educate the children. Let them take, for instance, the serious disturbance to discipline and efficiency that would be caused by the working of the facilities clauses, and, in addition, by the different times at which the children would be permitted to come to school in the morning. Both classes and curriculum would be disarranged. He was not surprised that the Minister for Education should say that under this clause a larger number of boys would be an object not of obloquy, but of envy to others, because the teachers would have no knowledge whether the children were coming to school or not, and the parents would have no knowledge that the children whom they were sending to school ever reached it. The result would be that a large number of children would absent themselves at the commencement of the day; the teacher would have a difficult task in the organisation of the classes to start with, and then he would have to rearrange the classes again when the second or third batch of children came in. He therefore opposed Clause 6 on educational grounds. He now came to the very serious question of child labour. He thought that Clause 6 opened the door very widely for a considerable extension of child labour. There were two forces at work in that direction: first, the greed of employers and, secondly, the selfishness of parents. Cheap child labour was always an attraction to a certain type of employer; and if children might be absent from school till a quarter to ten o'clock there would be a large increase in the number of boys and girls who would be employed to run errands; for indoor and outdoor work, and as domestic drudges. The children would not be fit for school instruction after a hard morning's work. Then the school attendance officers would lose control over the children. At least 10 per cent. of the children at present had to be compelled to attend school by the constant superintendence of the school attendance officers, and if they added inducements to children to stay away from school until 9.45 each morning, this would further increase the irregularity of attendance. He had the strongest objections to child labour. He thought that the world's work should be done by adult men—not by children or old men; and therefore the burden on children should not be increased but diminished. It might be asked why should not this matter be settled by the local education authority by by-law? He objected to that, because it would raise over again the religious difficulty which the House were trying to settle. They had, by a large majority, decided that they would not have secular instruction only in the elementary schools of the country; that there was to be undenominational religious teaching, and that certain special facilities were to be given for denominational religious instruction. As a Nonconformist he thought the Government had been too liberal in the latter respect; but he thought in common honour it would not become the House to take away those facilities by a kind of side issue; and they ought not to throw this bone of contention among the local education authorities. But neither did he want that the special facilities should be increased by a side issue. The object of hon. Gentlemen opposite was to ask for local option so as to provide a method of withdrawing the children from school during school hours and taking them to church. That was going beyond bounds and increasing the facilities for religious instruction beyond what the Committee had already granted. He thought it would be very much better, instead of leaving this to the local education authority, that it should be decided there and then definitely and distinctly what the policy was to be. He was very jealous of any interference with the effective working of the school system in the country and particularly of council schools in which there was no religious difficulty whatever. He believed that the Conscience Clause in Section 7 of the Act of 1870 was all that was required. In point of fact it was seldom put into operation. The people were entirely satisfied with the kind of religious instruction given in the council schools, and there was no demand for special religious teaching in some other building than the school. He could not understand why some hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House should want that system altered. He had no objection to the parents having the right upon a definite written request to have their children withdrawn from the school premises during the time religious instruction was being given, or, in the alternative, to their children being given secular or moral instruction in separate rooms during the religious instruction hour. Surely children who lived in squalid surroundings, whose lives were hard and prosaic, were the children who would benefit most by the touch of imagination given by the reading of the Bible story and parable. Surely the children who had to suffer most from, and were the victims of, the worst forms of industrial greed and selfishness most needed the lessons of love and humanity from the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount and the gracious influences of religion. It was for these reasons that he moved the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 9, after the word 'the,' to insert the words 'obligation of a.'"—(Mr. Walters.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) asked the hon. Member to read out in full the constructive effect of his Amendments.

Mr. WALTERS said that if his Amendments as a whole were accepted the clause would run—"The obligation of a parent to cause his child to attend school shall, notwithstanding any by-law, include an obligation to cause the child to attend at the schoolhouse during any time allotted to any religious observance, or to instruction in religious subjects, during the hours for which the schoolhouse is used for the purposes of a public elementary school. Provided that the local education authority shall provide during the time so allotted for any children who are withdrawn by their parents from any such observance or instruction some form of secular instruction."

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) inquired whether it was in order for an hon. Member to propose an entirely new clause upon an Amendment to insert "obligation of a," which meant nothing.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that no doubt the Amendment on the Paper was, by itself, utterly incomprehensible. But it was followed by others which made it comprehensible and was not out of order. He had already stated his reasons for allowing the Amendment and its fellows to be moved. It raised all the important issues raised by the clause itself, and raised them in a convenient form, although no doubt the effect of the Amendments taken as a whole was to remodel the clause to a greater extent than was desirable if any new issue had been raised by it.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.) said it would be in the recollection of the Committee that a few days ago he promised on behalf of the Government that the Committee should have an opportunity of voting on Clause 6 without any hint or suggestion being given to them by the employment of Government tellers. In this matter, therefore, their will was free, and he hoped hon. Members enjoyed that position. The issue was not altogether free from difficulty, and even of some measure of technicality; and he hoped hon. Members would allow him to state what was exactly the present state of the law upon the subject. Supposing Clause 6 were to be struck out of the Bill altogether and no fresh enactment of any kind made, how would the matter stand? Now, the existing by-laws made it perfectly plain that the parent of every child of not less than five or more than fourteen years of age should cause such child to attend school—the Committee would observe it did not say the schoolhouse—unless there was some reasonable excuse for non-attendance. The next by-law provided that the time during which the child should attend school should be the whole time that the school was open for instruction, subject, of course, to the conscience clause providing for the withdrawal of any child from religious instruction. It was a very ineffective conscience clause which was provided for under the Act of 1870. That Act was silent as to whether the right of withdrawal meant the right of withdrawal of the child from the school premises or whether it simply meant the right of withdrawal from the class in which religious instruction was given, although he believed that during the course of the debate in 1870 it was made perfectly plain that what was intended was the right to withdraw the child from the religious instruction and not from the schoolhouse itself. Ever since 1870 the general practice had been to require the nonconforming child to attend the schoolhouse, to stand apart from his fellows, and to be regaled with some branch of secular information instead of religious instruction. Then came the Act of 1902, which transferred the voluntary school to the local authority, and, at all events, imposed on the local authority for the first time the obligation of settling the time table and paying for the instruction. Then the question was raised in certain parts of the country as to whether the child could be taken at nine o'clock from the school to the church for religious instruction. The Board of Education decided that it was a question for every local authority to decide for itself, whether the by-law was complied with by allowing the child to be taken elsewhere for the purpose of receiving religious instruction. Then came the by-law called by the honoured name of the late Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Education. As a matter of fact, out of 326 local authorities ninety-four had adopted the Anson by-law, and 232 had not. Consequently the present state of the law might be stated as follows: Where the by-law had not been adopted—that was in the areas of 232 local authorities—every child was required to attend the schoolhouse during the religious instruction time, except in the very few cases where the local authority had indicated that it would regard attendance at church as equivalent to attendance at the schoolhouse. Where the new by-law prevailed—that was in ninety-four cases—the child need not attend the schoolhouse, if the parent had written in that sense, during the time of religious instruction. No doubt it was presumed that the child was absent in order to obtain religious instruction elsewhere, but there was no compulsion or obligation of any kind so to occupy the time when he was liberated from school. Consequently, taking that by-law into account, it rested entirely at present with every local authority in the country to decide whether there was compulsory attendance during religious instruction time or not. The local authority might adopt the by-law; if it did, the parent could notify in writing his desire to withdraw his child, and the child was withdrawn altogether from school during the period of religious instruction. That was within the option of every local authority in the country. As he had said, 232 local authorities went on with the law as before—namely, the child was supposed and required to attend the schoolhouse; although a parent has never been prosecuted for non-attendance, nevertheless, the child was required to attend at the schoolhouse for the purpose of receiving religious instruction or, in the alternative, secular instruction. That was the present situation. Were no law passed and Clause 6 deleted altogether, matters would remain in that position. He adhered in his own mind to Clause 6. Although he had been much affected by some of the considerations put forward on grounds of fear and alarm as to what would happen supposing parents got to know what it was assumed they did not know, that no harm would befall them if their children did not attend until the religious instruction was over, he supported Clause 6 for three reasons. In the first place he was perfectly satisfied that it was the only effective way of making the conscience clause a reality. It was a matter of great regret that all these years the conscience clause had remained ineffective; because if only it had been recognised as a real thing in our town and country school life—if it had become a thing under which a claim was easily made, readily granted, generously allowed, he did not believe they would have been in the difficulties they had been in all these years. The number of times in which the conscience clause had been enforced, considering the number of cases involved, was extremely small. He believed he knew why that was. The conscience clause was invented, conceived, and framed for the purpose of protecting the conscience of the parent; but it was so framed as to cast the whole burden of securing its enforcement upon the tender shoulders and the thin skin of the child, who was required to go to the school armed, it might be, with a document from his father, and to demand an exceptional, special kind of treatment, to be exposed undoubtedly to a good deal of remark and sarcasm, and to have given to it in lieu of religious instruction, some form, and very likely a disagreeable form, of secular knowledge. Therefore, he said that a conscience clause, if they wanted one, should be made a really effective one. They wanted to secure that it should be put into operation whenever it ought to be. They ought not to impose a burden, as the present conscience clause did, upon a child. Children could not, they really would not, and they ought not to be expected to submit to it. Anybody who had ever been in the position of a minority child, and who had not forgotten his own child-nature, would, he thought, recognise the truth of what he had said. Another reason for the clause as it stood was that it got rid of the difficulty of the school hours, by no means an improper thing to get rid of. The Committee had shown by a large majority that it wished religious instruction to be maintained in all the schools; and it had also, he was glad to say, secured some measure at all events of facilities for denominational teaching in the schools. He thought, therefore, it was all the more important and desirable that they should eliminate from the area of passion and shibboleth and Party feeling all that they could. The subject was difficult enough as it now stood, and anything that reduced the difficulties was to be commended. He thought, therefore, the fact that this clause did get rid of the difficulties of school hours was a distinct advantage. He would also point out, and he thought he was bound to point out, although this part of his argument might not approve itself to his hon. friend behind him, that this was not a bad denominational clause, since it did allow —and nobody, it seemed to him, whether he desired it or not, could by any possibility object to that—an opportunity for giving denominational teaching outside school hours, at the expense of those who gave it, in a very convenient form. It might be that those who did not like the denominational instruction might view with disfavour the idea that the practice should grow up in this country of, for example, the Church children being taken by the vicar or rector of the parish at nine in the morning to the church or the vestry for three-quarters of an hour's definite religious instruction; but no Nonconformist who had grasped the principle of his Nonconformity could have any objection to any such proposal. It was not done during school hours or out of the ratepayers' or taxpayers' funds. It was a matter of private zeal and of private devotion; and anybody who could secure that zeal and that devotion was, surely, at perfect liberty so to do. He thought, therefore, although not himself sharing the denominational zeal of many Gentlemen opposite, or sharing their view of the advantages gained by the children being taught together in school hours, that he was bound in justice and in truth to indicate that this clause as it stood did give to the children reasonable opportunities during the old time, at the old school hours of the day at which children had been accustomed to receive religious instruction, to receive this definite religious instruction. For these reasons he thought this clause was the most honest, the boldest, the clearest way of dealing with this difficult question. It made the conscience clause a reality, and enabled those persons who really did not wish their children to receive particular religious instruction to secure their withdrawal without putting upon them a too heavy and, indeed, intolerable obligation. All educationists would agree that it would be a grievous thing if the school-going habit, built up at an enormous expense of public money during the last thirty or forty years, were to be destroyed; but having made such inquiry as he could in London and other places, he could only say that there was a tendency to exaggerate the fears upon that matter referred to by his hon. friend. School-going had now become an ingrained habit in this country, and it was an entire mistake to assume that either the great majority of the parents or the great majority of the children reluctantly sent, or went, to school. The instances they had in London of the actual employment of children of school-going age in lucrative pursuits for gain at the expense of their school hours were happily very few indeed; and the prohibition of the law as to child labour, which was intended to be made severer than it was, and the growth of a much sounder opinion on this subject made it possible to hope that there would be in the future even fewer of such instances than in the past. He did not really think —although the subject was one that deserved careful consideration—that there was any occasion for the nervous dread and anxiety on this subject which animated very good people. For the reasons he had given, and having regard also to the general structure of the Bill, by which, Cowper-Temple instruction being made as universal as possible, and by the facilities now given under Clauses 3 and 4, they had done their best to give to the education of this country a distinctively religious flavour, he thought they were bound in the interests of religious liberty itself to adhere to the clause, and he recommended it accordingly to the Committee.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) hoped the Committee would permit him to say a few words on a subject in which he had taken a very great interest. Did the right hon. Gentleman intend the time table now existing, and which provided for the opening of the school at nine o'clock, to be continued, or was the hour of opening to be that which terminated at the end of the time usually allotted to religious instruction? It seemed to him that very much depended upon that. He believed that at the present time the parents had never been punished for not sending their children to school during the half hour allotted to religious instruction, but on the other hand the child had been submitted to penalties for non-attendance. Before this clause could be fully discussed the Government ought to explain to the Committee whether they intended that the time table should be in its present form. He entirely agreed with what had been said by the hon. mover of the Amendment, who had stated the position very clearly, and he did not think the answer given by the Minister for Education could be regarded either as complete or satisfactory. It was the pleasure of this House two or three years ago to pass a measure which was not so much enforced as he would wish it to be, for the regulation of the labour of children. They had abundant evidence, when they were dealing with that subject, of the unfortunate greed of too many parents shown in their desire to make use—improper use, as some Members thought—of the labour of their children, and to earn a few pence at the sacrifice of benefit to the children. If that were the case two or three years ago it was certainly the case now, and he did not think the Committee would be acting wisely if they ever passed legislation upon the principle that there had been a great change in the sense of parental duty in this respect. The real difficulty was that they were apt to fix their minds upon the great mass of parents and to pass over instances which, though not so numerous, were yet appreciable in their number. He could not dispose of this part of the case so lightly as did the right hon. Gentleman, who would find upon inquiry that there were practical grounds for the fears he ventured to express. Another strong and valid reason was the difficulty which parents would experience in exercising authority over their children during this half or three-quarters of an hour, and it had not been explained who else was to have supervision over them. He believed that in many cases, if they were not employed by their parents in gathering pence, they would certainly do business on their own account. Even if they did not adopt that course they would probably waste their time and get into evil habits through lack of that superintendence which all children required. They might fall into the practice of systematic deception towards their parents. There was one more point—he was speaking now after conversation with a most experienced teacher—and it was that there would be a great difficulty in securing prompt attendance at the secular hour. During the time devoted to religious teaching there was now some want of punctuality, but by the time secular instruction began the register was filled up by the presence of children. Another objection to the proposal was that it would encourage indolence on the part of a parent who would be enabled to commence the day's task half or three-quarters of an hour later.

*Mr. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) said he wished in a few words to explain why he was strongly in favour of the view submitted to the Committee by the President of the Board of Education. He thought the clause was the only real and effective protection for Nonconformist children in the small village schools. It must not be forgotten that under the Bill which was intended to establish a uniform system there were to be four types of school instead of two as in the past. So far as council schools were concerned, the proposal of his hon. friend the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield would be a distinctly retrograde step. He passed at once to village schools, with which he was chiefly concerned. He spoke as a Nonconformist, and, he believed, represented the overwhelming body of Nonconformists on this particular point; he hoped they might also receive the support of the Irish Catholics.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Certainly not.

*Mr. PERKS said he would give one or two reasons why the Amendment might perhaps be disadvantageous from the Catholic as well as from the Nonconformist point of view. The village schools in Lincolnshire at all events very generally contained a very large proportion of Nonconformists. He had had the figures taken out for several typical village schools. These schools all belonged to the National Society or church organisations, which in the course of the transfer would doubtless make it a condition that the facilities provided under Clause 3 should be enforced. The religious instruction would therefore take the form, he presumed, of Cowper-Temple instruction plus the special facilities, which might be given, as they had thought, on two days of the week, but which, according to an interpretation recently put on the clause, might, apparently, be given on five days a week. He was not quite sure what interpretation the Government put on that clause, as there was some little difference of opinion on the subject between the President of the Board of Education and the Leader of the Opposition. Be that as it might, the only protection which the Nonconformists would secure, if the Amendments now under discussion were passed, would be the conscience clause. In Lincolnshire the conscience clause had been an absolute farce. In one of the villages to which he would refer in a moment, where there were sixty-one Church of England children and 105 Nonconformists in the school, a labourer a few years ago who claimed the benefit of the conscience clause had a notice to quit served upon him almost immediately consequent on that claim. In another village school close by he himself saw on a winter morning two little children standing at the porch. He asked them what they were doing, and they said their father was a labourer in the village and that he claimed the benefit of the conscience clause. At Marshchapel, there were eleven Church of England children to 106 children of Nonconformist parents. In the next school there were sixty-one Church of England children, and 105 Nonconformists. In the third school there were seventeen children of Church parents and 120 Nonconformist children. In the fourth school there were twenty-six Church of England children and thirty-five Nonconformists; in the fifth school there were twenty Church of England children and eighty Nonconformists; and in the sixth ten Church of England children and twenty Nonconformists. In every one of these schools there would be distinctly sectarian instruction in accordance with the tenets of the Established Church, and if the Amendment were passed the only protection of the Nonconformist children who were in an overwhelming majority would be the conscience clause. The same proportion existed in Cornwall and in Durham as in Lincolnshire. The schools which claimed and received the special advantages of Clause 4, and certainly the State-aided schools, would be largely Anglican and Catholic. They would be affected to even a greater degree by the operation of the clause than the rural schools which by Clause 3 would be thrown back again into the hopeless and, as he thought, most unsatisfactory and unjust position in which they had hitherto been. He did not suggest that a child should be brought up without religious instruction, but he did think it was very important in many of these little villages, and particularly in small rural towns, that the parent should have an opportunity of seeing the nature of the religious instruction given in the schools before he decided whether he would avail himself of such religious instruction. It would be idle to say that the teacher must give secular instruction to the Nonconformist children who were withdrawn. The proportion in these schools between the two sections of the community was so overwhelmingly in favour of Nonconformity that the teacher could not be told off, during the period the Nonconformists were claiming the benefit of the conscience clause, to give religious instruction to a very small percentage. The clause was really the only effective protection the children of the rural districts would have against religious persecution, against the bringing to bear on them of all the hundred and one different ways of using the schools for the benefit of the Church. Therefore while he much regretted that the Government had not adhered to the clause as they brought it in, but had run away from its provisions, he was very glad to find the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill hâd had the courage to state to the Committee so clearly his views so far as he was personally concerned.

MR. DILLON remarked that the hon. Member for the Louth Division had asked him to take the same attitude as he had taken on this clause. Perhaps the hon. Member would be astonished if he said he had not heard from him a single argument in support of the clause. The instance he had mentioned of religious persecution in Lincolnshire would not apply to the parent who withdrew his child altogether. He was astonished at the description given of the condition of the schools in Lincolnshire. When the Minister for Education drew a picture of the feelings of what he was pleased to call the minority children he sympathised with him, but the schools of Lincolnshire did not contain minority children. Were they to be told that the Nonconformists of Lincolnshire were so cowardly and had so little self-respect that seventeen Church children out of 140 children could dominate the school?

*MR. PERKS said he never suggested anything of the sort. His argument was that the majority should not be tyrannised over.

MR. DILLON contended that that argument would apply with equal force if Clause 6 was passed, because there would be a more ample opportunity for persecution. The only argument which had been adduced in favour of this clause by the Minister for Education was that in certain schools where there was a small minority the children might be placed at a disadvantage by being asked to stand aside. Was that argument strong enough to justify the introduction of a clause which amounted to a reversal of the decision of the Committee on Clause 1? This was a secular education clause. Had the Minister for Education forgotten the great change that was going to be made in the system of education by this Bill? What was the burning necessity for the conscience clause? What was going to be the established religion of the country? Was it against the established religion that they required a conscience clause? [MINISTERIAL cries of "Yes."] Then why did hon. Members opposite not support the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Burnley? Those who refused to support the hon. Member on that occasion expressed the opinion that the children should be educated in simple Bible teaching or fundamental Christianity. For the future in the vast majority of the schools the Nonconformists of England would have the religious education which they had selected, and it was against that that they required an extended form of the conscience clause. He had been appealed to as a champion of the rights of parents and he had been asked why he did not support this clause so as to give the parent a right to withdraw his child from religious instruction. Would hon. Members on the Ministerial side be willing to extend that principle and give those who desired denominational instruction a right to withdraw their children from secular instruction? That was quite logical. ["No, no."] He thought it was. This clause was a solemn announcement to the whole of the English people that religion must take a back seat in all the schools of England. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] It was an announcement that for the future compulsory education was to apply only to subjects of secular instruction, while religion was to be outlawed. The Anson by-law had been alluded to, but that was a very different thing from Clause 6. It was a rather confused document, but it laid down that where an individual parent served a written demand or notification that he wished to withdraw his child from religious instruction he should have the right to do so. Although that by-law was issued two years ago, only one-third or one-fourth of the local bodies were putting it into force. But that was totally different from what was now proposed in Clause 6, because it threw upon the parent the somewhat invidious task of sending in a written application, but that was different from declaring to the whole of England that there was no necessity for a parent to send his child to attend religious instruction. What would be the inevitable result? He agreed that this clause was entirely vicious in its operation, but it would affect least of all the Catholic schools, because the priest could be trusted to bring in the Catholic children in spite of this clause. Therefore its main effect would be on the non-Catholic schools, although it would affect Catholic schools in the long run. The withdrawal of children from religious instruction was a kind of thing that would spread, because the whole school would begin to envy those children who enjoyed the privilege of being withdrawn, and year by year their numbers would gradually increase. He believed that was the reason why the clause aroused enthusiasm amongst those who supported a secular system. It was simply introducing secularism through the back door, and so far as the Protestant schools, were concerned it was distinctly a secular clause. He would like to have a poll of the teachers of England on the question. It would have a bad effect on the schools, and above all it would have a bad effect in the case of selfish parents. The Minister for Education had said he did not believe that the majority of parents unwillingly sent their children to school or that the children went unwillingly to school. There were, he believed, a large minority that did send their children very unwillingly, and unless child nature had changed since he was a boy, many children went to school unwillingly and would be very glad of an extra hour at home in the morning, or for play on the way to school. What he was most concerned about was the selfish parent, who would not take the trouble to get his child ready in time for school or would employ him in work about the house. If a parent chose he could keep his child away for an hour after school began. The difficulty of school hours could always have been got rid of by keeping religion outside school hours, and that was what the clause proposed to do. It was a curious thing that at the time when this proposition was made to inform all the parents of England that they might, and to invite them to keep away their children from school while religion was being taught, there was introduced into the Code a new direction of a very curious and interesting type, called moral instruction, which would form an important part of every elementary school curriculum. It was his opinion that all moral instruction should be based on Christianity. The new direction included the following: Cleanliness of mind and body, love of fair play, gentleness to the weak, temperance, humanity, and self-denial. All these excellent teachings rested on Christianity. Nevertheless the Christian religion was to be driven outside school hours and some form of ethics was to be employed instead. What Catholics believed was that some religious belief should permeate the whole school teaching. The Amendment appeared to him to be one of a series of Amendments to make the clause do exactly the opposite of that which it now proposed to do. If the Amendment were carried it meant that the clause would be precisely the opposite of that which the Minister for Education intended. He heartily supported the Amendment. He could only characterise the clause as an attempt to carry secularism, not frankly and openly, but by a gradual and insidious process.

MR. PAUL (Northampton) said the hon. Member for the Louth Division was the acknowledged leader of Nonconformity in this House, and he had referred with a contempt which he fully shared to the ambiguities and inconsistencies of Clause 3. He could not help reminding the hon. Member that he (Mr. Paul) got no assistance from him on that point when the clause was passed, but he trusted that he would be more fortunate when he moved the rejection of the clause on Report. The question before the Committee, however, was not one to be judged between Nonconformists and Anglicans, or between Roman Catholics and Protestants, or even between Conservatives and Liberals, but between those who desired religion as a sort of extra subject and those who thought religion should be an integral and fundamental part of all education. He could not help thinking that it was from the religious training of the young in this country that there came those rare, high-minded, disinterested characters such as that whose loss they were all deploring at that moment—their dear friend, the friend of all of them, Sir Wilfrid Lawson. He was very glad the Government had seen their way to allow the Committee to vote on this question as they pleased. He did not know whether the reason for that unexpected laxity was due to the fact that the Government had for once been unsuccessful in their search for a mandate. All this talk about mandates made him tired and sick. Mandate, mandate, everywhere, there was no room to think. Were they automata? Were they all mandate, and no mind? As, however, every Member with a mandate claimed to interpret it for himself, perhaps the independence of the House was in that way recovered. The question was whether religion, subject to the conscience clause, was or was not to be in the future an integral part of the teaching in all elementary schools, and he earnestly trusted that the Committee would decide that it was. He was very much afraid that if they did not insist upon religion being part of the ordinary curriculum they might be driven to something like that sinister future darkly sketched by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in which a number of wrangling and differing theologians were to be let loose upon the children to teach them to hate each other for the love of God. He prayed that He in His good providence might avert that awful calamity and enable the children to grow up in the future as they had grown up in the past with the two things that could never fail them—the example of their Saviour's teaching and the consciousness of their Father's care.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said he did not propose to follow the hon. Member for Northampton in the discussion of the scheme put forward by his right hon. friend the Member for West

Birmingham, for that did not appear to arise directly on this Amendment. It appeared to him that the clause as it stood, besides being open to the objection urged against it by the hon. Member for East Mayo and others, gave the children the opportunity of doing three things. It permitted them to go to school and get what he would call for shortness the State religion; it enabled them to be kept away, and, as the Minister for Education pointed out, to receive at their homes or elsewhere the religion which their parents prefered; or, lastly, it enabled the parents either to employ the children or to allow them to go and play on the streets. Quite apart from the other aspects of the question it appeared to him to be an undesirable thing that children should be encouraged either to undergo labour before going to school, or to play in the streets. He understood that was one of the main objections of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment; he proposed by way of alteration to prevent children from doing work or playing, and he required them to go to school either to get secular instruction or the State religion. That did not appear to him to be a fair arrangement. It appeared to be, he would not say creating, but establishing that form of religion in almost all the schools of the country, and also compelling the children to receive that religion or no other. It might be right—he thought it was right—to prevent the children from playing in the streets or doing work, but he did not think it was right to prevent them from receiving at home or elsewhere the religious instruction which their parents desired. It seemed to him to be a gross piece of intolerance, if he might say so, to interfere with the rights of the father to teach his children what he pleased. Therefore the Amendment which he had on the Paper, † and which he proposed to move——

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the noble Lord's Amendment should come after the word "shall," or after the word "objection" in the second line of the clause. It does not seem to arise at this point at all.

LORD R. CECIL said that in view of the Chairman's ruling he would not deal with the specific Amendment which he had intended to move, but he presumed he would be in order in discussing the general effect of the clause, and of the possible modification which would make it more tolerable. The matter for the consideration of the Committee was whether it was really desirable to give the special position which the Amendment now before them would to the State religion, because the effect of it would be to say to the children that if they wished they could receive this State religion, or they could receive secular instruction, but if they desired or if their parents desired any other kind of religious instruction it must be taught to them in play time or at some other time. That made it additionally difficult for the children to receive the religious instruction which their parents preferred. He could not think that was fair. It was said that there was no hardship in compelling children to receive this undenominational religion. [AN HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.] He was glad to hear that cheer, because, taking the advice of the Minister for Education, he had looked at the return of syllabuses, and he confessed that he had arrived at some conclusions which were not altogether in accordance with those of the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, there was no guarantee practically in the vast majority of the syllabuses that the religious instruction would be effective at all. In most cases there was no inspection. He did not deny that many of the teachers would give good religious instruction under the syllabuses, but it must be remembered that it would not be grant-earning instruction, and that it would not be tested in any way by examination. That seemed to him to be a very unsatisfactory way of giving religious instruction in schools. The charge made by the hon. and learned Member for Louth was perfectly accurate, namely, that the forms of religious instruction sanctioned were exceedingly varied. That was very unsatisfactory. He commended to the attention of hon. Members who believed in simple Bible teaching the fact that the religious instruction was highly dogmatic. It was not the teaching of the Church of England, or of the Roman Catholic Church, but it was, nevertheless, highly dogmatic. To tell any sensible person—if he might class himself in that category—that it was simple undogmatic teaching was really an insult to his intelligence. He instanced the Cornwall syllabus, which provided for the teaching of the Apostles' Creed and practically the whole of the New Testament, and also for the giving of explanations by the teacher of passages of Scripture. It was not possible that such teaching should be anything but highly dogmatic. He noticed curiously enough that in teaching the Apostles' Creed it was required that the teacher, in dealing with two of the final clauses of that Creed, should put a particular meaning upon them. In other words, in teaching the most controversial clauses of the whole Creed the teacher was to select a particular interpretation which would not be assented to by a large number of Christian denominations. How could hon. Gentlemen opposite tell him that that was not a denominational religion? Of course it was—or it would be if anyone were to adopt it as his creed, and the only reason why it was put in the syllabus was that it had not been definitely adopted by any denomination. It was said that this clause would be a hardship to numbers of Nonconformists in Lincolnshire who would be compelled to send their children to school on two days of the week when denominational religious instruction was given; but how much greater would be the hardship on Church children who would be compelled to attend five days in the week when so-called undenominational religious instruction was given? He confessed that if the clause were amended as proposed by the hon. Member for the Brightside Division, he would have the greatest difficulty in supporting it; but if it were amended in the way he had suggested in the earlier part of his speech his objection to it would be lessened. The true solution of the difficulty would be the withdrawal of the Nonconformist children for religious instruction elsewhere. That would prevent the employment of children in other pursuits and would not encourage them to desert religious instruction altogether. The real reason why he objected to the clause as it stood was that it gave a secularist flavour to the whole Bill. If in addition to saying that the formula of any particular Church was not to be taught, they said that they did not think much of dogmatic religion and did not wish their children to be taught it, then they gave a downward impetus to all religious teaching. Although personally, as the Committee knew, he disapproved altogether of undenominational religious teaching, which he thought was wrong, he would rather have undenominational teaching such as was provided for by the Cornwall syllabus, given by Christian men, than no religious teaching at all. He did not deny that such teaching was of some value; but he would rather have a secularist system than a rotten undenominational system, which pretended to give the children religious instruction but did not. In the undenominational system which set out to teach the children sweetness and light, he had no faith whatever. That was giving the children a stone when they asked for bread.

† The Amendment standing in the name of Lord R. Cecil was to insert in the proposed Amendment, after the word "obligation," the words "except as hereinafter provided;" and at end to add "and that a parent shall not be subject to any penalty under this section for not causing his child to attend the schoolhouse during any time so allotted if he shows to the satisfaction of the court that he has caused his child during that time to attend some form of religious observance or instruction elsewhere."

Lord R. Cecil.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.) said he would sooner have the children taught religion of some kind than none at all. He thought that in school hours the children should have moral instruction, to which their parents could not object. He felt certain that if the children were allowed to go to school at different times there would be no regularity of attendance, for the ordinary workman had no great desire on the matter of religious teaching for his children; it would be found that the schools would become emptier and emptier, and the children would be allowed to run about the streets or would be employed at home. He believed that the teachers themselves would prefer that there should be some regular hour for attendance at school, and that the children whose parents did not desire that they should be given special denominational instruction, should be given moral teaching, such as kindness to their fellow men and to animals. There should be equality and freedom to all and no such thing as compelling children to be taught certain forms of religion in which the parents did not believe.

*Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said that the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Brightside division of Sheffield should be supported, but with one proviso: that the parents who did not approve of the particular religious instruction given in the school should be able to withdraw their children in order that they might receive instruction elsewhere. What did this clause frankly say? It said that in every school, whether a board school or any other, the religious instruction was to be given out of school hours. That was a startling change, and he asked on what grounds it was proposed? It had been alleged that the present conscience clause had not given sufficient protection to the children of minorities and that the Nonconformists had, consequently, been put under disabilities. He did not think that had been so in the past; but supposing it had, surely under the new conditions all possibility of any injustice would be removed. It should be remembered that every school was to be under the control of the local education authority, who would be perfectly able to ensure that no child should be put in an invidious position by being withdrawn from religious instruction. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education said on the First Reading of the Bill that no conscience clause was worth anything unless it carried with it the right to withdraw children from the schoolhouse during the time religious instruction was being given. He entirely disagreed with that, and the right hon. Gentleman had advanced no arguments in support of his assertion; therefore he could not see why they should change the conscience clause. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that under this clause a child instead of being an object of obloquy would be an object of envy. Was that a thing to rejoice at? The right hon. Gentleman also said in the course of his speech that there was safety in the Hampshire syllabus, and he agreed that that was so. Everything went on very well in Hampshire, and no doubt if other county councils and local education authorities would follow the example set in Hampshire things would go on very well everywhere else. But what was the use of the Hampshire or any other syllabus at all until they had got the children into the school to learn the syllabus? The clause was not asked for by the Church of England, nor by the Roman Catholics, and he was quite sure that the majority of the Free Churches were in opposition to it. This was not a question of High Church or Low Church or of Free Church or State Church. To his mind the question which the clause raised was whether there should be religion in the schools or not. It had been said that if this clause were passed the parents who really desired their children to receive religious instruction would ensure its being given even if there was no religious instruction given in the school at all, and would give religious instruction to their children in their own homes or see that it was given. Of course that was so, and such parents in matters of religious education were above the law. They were not legislating for them, but for the great mass of parents who were indifferent. They were not legislating for the parent who was an atheist but for the parent who was indifferent. He asked the Committee to consider the state of a school after nine o'clock and during the time in which religious teaching was being given. The regular teachers would in many cases be absent and the different denominational teachers would come in and endeavour to instruct the children in their religious Catechism. These religious teachers would naturally not have the same influence over the children as the regular teachers, and meanwhile the scholars would be distracted by the shouts of the other children in the playground who were not receiving religious instruction. The clause, in his opinion, must be amended or ended. What did they ask? They only asked that religious teaching should be put on an equality with cooking or arithmetic—on an equality with secular education, and that it should have a recognised place in our system of education. It was quite obvious that, if this Bill were passed, while Jack would be helping his mother to wash up, Gill would be minding the baby in the parlour during the time that religious instruction was being given in the school. The fons et origo of the clause seemed to have been the experience which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education went through in his childhood; and from his own experience of his own childhood, he quite agreed as to the difficult position which a child would be in if told to object to being present whilst religious teaching was being given. Surely, however, that difficulty could be got over by the parent writing and objecting to his child being given any particular religious instruction. The right hon. Gentleman himself agreed that to exclude the opening prayer and hymn would be to run counter to the instincts of the nation, and he agreed with him. But why were these religious exercises to be put into such a secondary place? If arithmetic were not made a compulsory subject, how many children when they left school would be able to do a simple sum? In the same way, if religious instruction was not made compulsory in the future we should have few churches and chapels needed. If the Government were weathercocks in regard to this matter the country were not in the same position. It was true that the Government had voted against secular education but they had brought in this clause and left it an open question. If the clause were passed, it would, he was sure, inflict a deep and lasting injury upon the people of this country.

MR. MASTERMAN (West Ham, N.) said a series of speeches had been directed against the clause as it originally stood. The last speaker had put the case most tersely and clearly in protesting against religion being put into a position in the schools different from arithmetic, geography, or any other form of secular instruction. But the claim of those who supported the clause was that religion at the present time occupied a position different from these forms of secular instruction, and that the conscience clause had for thirty-six years up to the present been frankly inoperative. They believed that it would be for the advantage of religion as well as of those who felt conscientious disabilities if some kind of freedom was substituted for coercion in the schools of the country. He was interested in the speech of the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone and was not without hope that finally he might be found voting with them in favour of Clause 6, because he seemed to prefer the clause as it stood. To say that it was an affirmation of secular education was not true. He wished it was. They were not in the least trying to get secular education by any backdoor as had been suggested. The question beteen the liberty of the parent to choose religion or no religion for his child was perfectly different from the question whether the State should provide any kind of religious instruction at all. He was surprised at the speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo, because no compulsion was ever required towards Roman Catholic parents. Why did he interpose and try to place compulsion on other classes of people? This protection was wanted in rural districts, where the conscience clause had practically failed. It was also true of the non-provided schools in the great majority of the villages in England; otherwise, if there was no religious difficulty, he could not imagine what all this bother that they had been spending the summer over was about. If many of the children in the villages, whose parents protested, still attended the schools and did not take advantage of the religious test then there was the less reason to apply fresh religious tests. One hon. Member had stated that although he objected to religious teaching being given to his children he declined to allow them to be put under the obligation of being put into a place separate and apart from the other children of the school during the time of religious instruction. To all children such a thing as that gave a sense of discomfort, and to a sensitive child it was torture. Therefore it was time that an advance should be made in the direction of religious freedom, that the children of those parents who desired it should be enabled to receive, so far as it was possible under the Bill, instruction in the various kinds of religion that they desired, and that those who did not desire it should be able to withdraw their children from the school during the period in which religious instruction was given. A very strong case had been made out on the words "child labour."

Child labour had been mentioned, and the hon. Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield had to a large extent grounded his appeal for the acceptance of this Amendment upon that particular question. Nobody deplored child labour more than he (Mr. Masterman) did, unless it were the hon. Member for North Camberwell. But this was not the way to deal with child labour. If the Committee had the courage and tenacity of its convictions anything in the nature of child labour before the hours of school attendance could easily be prohibited. They seemed, however, to be afraid of prohibition and tried to squeeze out child labour by providing theological alternatives. Child labour would never be squeezed out in that way; the only result would be to make children work earlier; to make them have less sleep, less playtime, and less time for breakfast, and it was no use to attempt to deal with the question in that way. He could not see, as had been suggested, that the new system would in any way result in the disorganisation of the schools. Parents would be asked whether their children should come for religious instruction or not. [Cries of "No."] He thought that that was the way in which the local authorities would administer the Bill, and the children who wished to come would arrive at nine o'clock in the morning and arrangements would be made to have them taught at that hour. He did not gather that children would be allowed to come to school some at nine and some at five or ten minutes past in the same way as Members came into the House to listen to this debate. There would be no trace of compulsion. It would be brought about by means of peaceful persuasion at the hands either of the teacher or of the parent, and he conceived that every form of peaceful persuasion would be brought to bear upon the children to induce them to come at that hour. Then at 9.45 the secular business of the school would commence. The roll would be called. There would be no disorganisation and there was nothing in that system that the teachers need or would object to. It was a practical question of the enlargement of the scope of religious liberty which was not beyond the capacity of this House to decide in regard to the educational system which the local authorities of this country would have to administer. He knew that he approached this subject from a different point of view from that of many who sat upon the Liberal side of the House. He approached the subject from the point of view of one who objected to any kind of State religion. He thought it monstrous and illiberal that a State religion should be manufactured by the schools, and more monstrous and more illiberal to say that every taxpayer or ratepayer should contribute towards the expense of that State religion; and most monstrous and most illiberal that every child of every parent should be obliged to attend the instruction in that religion. That was really what they were doing under a conscience clause which was ineffective. That gave him a right to appeal not only to the Free Churches, who would not be free if they consented to it, but also to Members on the opposite side of the House to vote against the elaboration of any particular form of religion to be taught in the State schools of this country. [An HON. MEMBER: It is Christianity.] Christianity if they liked, but there were a good many people who had conscientious objections to the teaching of Christianity; and he did not see how their consciences should be regarded as less sensitive than the consciences of others. That was at the bottom of the protest against Clause 6. It was an unequal judgment of the conscience of the poor in comparison with the conscience of other classes.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) said that the President of the Board of Education had stated with the utmost clearness the law as it now stood, but he could not entirely agree with his interpretation of the by-law which he had described as the Anson by-law. What the right hon. Gentleman had stated was not the intention of the by-law; it was not the meaning of it, and it could not bear the interpretation placed upon it. There was one objection to the bare rejection of the clause—that it would then be left in the discretion of the local authority, subject to the approval of the Board of Education, to order that the children should only be bound to attend school during the hours of secular instruction. Knowing what he did of the inclinations of some local authorities, and hearing what had been said by the Minister for Education he feared this might result in many cases in religious teaching being placed out of school hours. The Amendment of the hon. Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield practically put into a statutory form the commonly existing by-law and the common practice. The Amendment, as being in the line of the present practice, was preferable to the simple rejection of the clause and infinitely preferable to the acceptance of the clause as it stood. The alternative he preferred was that if the children were withdrawn it should only be on the understanding that they might receive religious instruction elsewhere. This was the substance of an Amendment put down by himself and by some hon. friends. The Minister for Education had told them frankly that his object was to put religious instruction out of school hours. They would thus throw aside the religious instruction which had gone on in the schools in one form or another since 1870. They had been told that the conscience clause had hitherto been ineffective and that this was to be a conscience clause of a higher form—a glorified conscience clause particularly favourable to the Nonconformist case. He had been surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's criticism of the ineffectiveness of the clause, having always previously heard it discussed from the point of view of its extreme imporance. Nonconformist children ought not now to be likely to suffer any hardship, for every school would be a council school, and the sort of religious teaching favoured by Nonconformists would be universally given, while the facilities under Clauses 3 and 4 could surely be so dealt with as not to harass the sensitive consciences of the Nonconformist children, who on all the days of the week would be receiving their own religious instruction. Much had been said in previous debates of the value of teaching fundamental Christianity. It now appeared that the Minister for Education's laudation of Cowper-Temple teaching meant not that anyone was to be required to receive it, but only that it was good enough to be paid for by everybody, whether they liked it or not. The Amendment which the hon. Member for Burnley moved to a previous clause was a straightforward Amendment proposing to keep religious teaching definitely out of school hours. Now they had what had been fairly and appropriately described as a back door settlement of this question. The Government had shut the front door boldly in the face of the straightforward Amendment. Now they opened the back door and stretched out both their hands to secular instruction, to encourage in their way the view that neither parent was bound to send nor child to attend religious instruction, nor any teacher bound to give it. In these circumstances, where no one need teach religion and no one need learn it, why could they not honestly say they wished to sever religion from education and set up a secular system? The Government had not the courage of their opinion, but he must have the courage of his. He maintained the immense advantage of commencing with prayer and religious teaching the education daily given in the public elementary schools. He believed the value of this system to be immense in rural areas, and incalculable in our large towns, where to many it was the only form of religious teaching to which the child ever listened. The Minister for Education incurred an immense responsibility when he struck this blow at the heart of the religious life of the country.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) said he really thought the hon. Baronet might have left the conscience of the Government alone when he himself was prepared to vote in a sense contrary to that of the celebrated by-law bearing his name. The hon. Baronet himself was the author of the system which he condemned in Clause 6, and it was rather hard on his part to challenge the conscience of the Government on that matter. This was a subject upon which he (Mr. Channing) felt more deeply than upon any other subject which had come before them in regard to this Bill. He lamented that the discussions on this Bill had been so confined to the competing claims of rival sectarian bodies and that so little reference had been made to the interests of the children. Was it or was it not the interest of little children to be in the school at nine o'clock so that they should learn something in the earlier hours of the day when their faculties were fresh? Why should parents be encouraged to withdraw them in the early hours because of wretched religious squabbles? If there was any justification for the Bill it was because it was a generous, loyal effort to introduce peace into the schools, to create an atmosphere freed from sectarian passion where the education of the children could really be expanded. He was an opponent of Clause 6 because it was not the right way to seek peace to encourage the withdrawal of just those classes of children who most needed the higher influences. It was because it was a better way to secure peace that in furtherance of that object he most heartily supported the Amendment. He perfectly appreciated his right hon. friend's motives and supported his protest against the inefficiency of the conscience clause—he had more than once taken his share in vindicating the rights of parents under the conscience clause; but if passing this clause meant that the consciences of one or two parents would be satisfied; for one child who might be saved from hearing religious teaching from which its parents disapproved, might not hundreds of children be turned into child slaves? Why should they seek to destroy the discipline of the schools; and why should thousands of children lose the opportunity of getting in the freshness of the morning the teaching they ought to have, whether it were secular or religious? They had finally banished the one man power and had established public control over the schools, and therefore the bogey of religious oppression did not really any longer exist. He did not think that cases of religious persecution were likely to occur in the future. Having regard to the serious social results and the serious educational and moral wrecking among the slum children of our great towns that would result from the worst class of parents withdrawing their children during the time religious instruction was being given, he hoped the Committee would not adopt the clause. Many years ago he took an active part as one of its founders in the work of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and he sat for some years upon the Law Committee which dealt with cases of cruelty to children Like others in that House, he had sat on the Committee which passed the Employment of Children Bill and studied the terrible evidence of the labour of school children out of school hours on which it was based. The interests of hundreds and thousands of children were affected, and they could not be set aside as they would be by this Clause. He had received a letter from a lady who was one of the leading social reformers in Liverpool, and who had been for many years on the school authorities, giving her opinion as to the result this clause would have upon the slum population. She wrote—

> "In Liverpool the careless and vicious parent far outnumbers the parent with a conscientious objection to some form of denominational teaching. Unless the children are obliged to be in school, at the same time, some will evade school, or move from school to school. In the lower parts of the town it would be useless to open the council schools at all till 9.45, the only schools that would have any religious or moral teaching would be the Catholic, who would probably get their children at 9 a.m. We could not. . . . I much hope that we may continue our present arrangement of finally shutting all the school doors in Liverpool at 9 a.m."

Often parents were negligent of the highest interests of their children, whom they regarded more as drudges to earn for them a few extra pence to enable them to eke out their own sordid and often immoral lives. It was the duty of the Committee to protect the child life of the country, and he asked them to pause before they accepted a Clause like this. He appealed also to the Labour Members to look upon this from the point of view of labour, for surely they did not wish to see child life crushed down by the demand for early labour. Surely they would feel their obligation to resist in some way the competition of child labour with adult labour in the labour market. On these grounds he hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) saw no necessity for the clause to meet a religious difficulty. It was an invitation to children to barter their religious teaching for half an hour's play. Slum children had no chance of religious teaching in their homes and surroundings. He did not see any reason for this clause at all. He had not seen any religious difficulty worth speaking of in any denominational school. He knew there was no such difficulty in the case of his own village. He was himself an employer of dissenters, and he had gone so far as to offer to facilitate their views, and they had told him that they had no views to facilitate. This clause seemed to him to have for its object the gradual abolition of religious teaching in the schools of the poor. The rich man could retain his schools just because he was rich, but the poor man had to sacrifice his religious teaching simply because he was poor and for no other reason. The clause would make poverty a new religious disability. ["Why?"] If they wished to deprive the children of their religious education let them toe the line and do it frankly and openly themselves, but they should not in this indirect way invite the children to be the agents of their own undoing. There ought to be no mistake whatever about this question. A slum child had no chance at all of getting any religious education in its own home and surroundings. The President of the Local Government Board on one occasion spoke of 200,000 children living with their parents in single rooms. Those children could not get religious instruction in the pandemonium in which they lived; and they were not sent to the Sunday schools. Religious instruction in the day school was their only chance. He asked hon. Members to think of the state of things in common lodging-houses. [Laughter.] It was his weekly task to visit such houses, and he knew quite as much about them as the hon Member who jeered. No form of home religion was possible in the overcrowded bedrooms and common rooms of lodging-houses. The children must have worship at school, or they would have no worship at all. Did the Committee wish this arrangement made in a country which was called Christian? It was nothing short of folly—it was hardly honest—to tell them that these children would get instruction either in their own homes or at the Sunday school. What he and his friends pleaded for was half an hour's religious instruction a day for the children attending the day school, because it was their only chance of receiving such instruction. He did not wish the children to be taken away from that instruction to play marbles. This clause introduced a new condition in the country—namely, elementary schools without religion. All he could say was, God help the children and save them from being sacrificed to political alliances—from being made the pawns in the Party game. They were made for better things, and he only hoped that the Imperial Parliament would do nothing to tamper with the religious purpose of their lives.

*DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said this was a matter to which he had given great consideration because he recognised that it was of far reaching importance. There was really very much confusion of thought as to the existing state of the law. He was therefore very much obliged to the President of the Board of Education for the statement he made at the outset. The right hon. Gentleman correctly stated that Section 14 of of the Act of 1870 said to the parents—"You must bring your child to school at nine o'clock when the school opens; if you do not want religious instruction provided your child can stand aside, and the local authority—the school board that was—will provide secular instruction for the child in the meantime." Then the right hon. Gentleman said he was greatly surprised that the conscience clause had not operated to a greater extent than it had done, and he gave some reasons for that. He himself thought that the main reason why the conscience clause in the Act of 1870 had failed was that the parents thought their children were perfectly safe in the hands of the teachers, just as most hon. Members did in regard to their children. If these debates went on long enough he felt that he should be obliged to interfere in some way with the religious teaching which his children were getting at the present time. What it precisely was he could not say, and he hoped no one would say that he had not a keen regard for their welfare. No doubt another reason was that parents naturally shrank from exposing their children to the invidiousness of standing out. These two reasons formed the main grounds for the failure of the conscience clause. Although the attendance of the child was compulsory, they had never gone the length of prosecuting any working man because he had not sent his child to school until the close of the religious lesson. That was the law down to four years ago when it was very materially widened. In 1903 the hon. Member for Oxford University introduced a by-law, known as the "Anson" by-law. He was sure that the hon. baronet would not intentionally mislead the Committee, but he nevertheless had effectually done so in his references to this by-law. It was in the following terms—

> "The time during which every child shall attend school shall be the whole time for which the school selected shall be open for the instruction of children of similar age, provided that, where the parent has notified to the managers in writing his intention to withdraw the child from instruction in religious subjects, such time shall be the whole time for which the school selected shall be open for secular instruction only."

SIR WILLIAM ANSON: If the hon. Member will read the note, he will see exactly the object with which the by-law was offered to, not imposed upon, the local authorities for their consideration.

*DR. MACNAMARA said the note was as follows—

> "This proviso may be added in cases where the local education authority are satisfied that the circumstances of the locality justify its adoption in order to meet the wishes of parents who may desire to make arrangements for religious instruction for their children elsewhere than at school."

No doubt that was the intention, but the Board of Education had passed this by-law in a large number of cases without any such proviso. If the Government was to be charged with setting up what the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone would describe as the ultimate cataclysm of secularism, it did not lie with the late Government, which originally laid down that by-law when the hon. Baronet was Parliamentary Secretary, to make the charge. What had been the result of the by-law? No less than thirty-seven counties, eight county boroughs, thirty-six non-county boroughs, and thirteen urban districts—ninety-four in all—in the short period of three years had put the Anson by-law into operation. He did not know that anything very terrible had happened in those areas. He had not heard that there had been an increase in child labour or that a large number of children had been withdrawn from religious teaching. His point was that the by-law was embodied in Clause 6 of the present Bill, and if there was to be a cataclysm of secularism the hon. Baronet opposite was responsible and not the present Government.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON: Has the hon. Gentleman any reason to suppose that the by-law has not answered the purpose for which it was issued?

THE CHAIRMAN: We are really getting into a discussion about the by-law which, except in so far as it has a bearing upon the Amendment to the clause, has nothing to do with this discussion.

*DR. MACNAMARA said his point was that the justification of Clause 6 lay in the Anson by-law. He wanted the children to be taught the Bible, but he was doubtful whether they ought to be compelled to attend, especially under the new circumstances which this Bill would set up. There was some confusion of thought on the part of those who said that unless the children attended the religious lesson they would not get any religious teaching at all. Nothing could be more wide of the mark. If the religious lessons were stopped to-morrow, the children would get a good deal of sound, useful, religious teaching. He had been a pupil teacher, assistant teacher, and head teacher, for twenty years, and he knew that by far the most fruitful lessons were those which arose incidentally from time to time outside the formal Bible lesson. The Bible lesson consisted of Bible history, incidents, and names, to a large extent, and could not have much of real moral value in it. The hon. Member for East Mayo had spoken as if in the new Education Code he had found a new and strange system of moral teaching set up. There was no discovery at all. This was not the first time that moral teaching had been made an injunction on teachers. It was said in the new Code—

> "They (the teachers) can teach them what is noble, to be ready and self-sacrificing, and to strive their utmost after purity and truth."

Was not that religious teaching? All this was elaborated into a moral code in the Code issued that morning. The hon. Gentleman admitted that that was a most admirable elaboration, but he overlooked the fact that the teachers were specially enjoined to notice that—

> "The scope of such lessons should be carefully defined in order to guard against doing or expressing anything in the least subversive of the authority of religion."

He admitted that compulsion to attend school at religious instruction had, subject to the conscience clause, been the practice ever since 1870, although it was modified three years ago. Why had they been able successfully to compel the parents to send their children to school? The thing was entirely in the hands of the permanent school teachers, who were very discreet, very circumspect, and who used infinite good judgment. Had it not been for that discretion, circumspection, and good judgment there would have been a social revolution long ago. The teachers did not press denominational views, even in denominational schools where they knew the children were Nonconformists, so that by their good judgment compulsion had been made possible. But now they were starting a new system under which in every denominational school, on two mornings a week, they were going to have specific denominational teaching by others than the permanent teachers—by the clergymen, and the curates whose real purpose and intention must be to exalt and exaggerate what he would call the sectarian side of denominational religious teaching. Did the Committee think that in that case, with outside teachers necessarily inspired with this particular purpose of giving the teaching a special denominational turn—and he had not a word to say against them—did the Committee think that they could continue the system of compulsion? He was perfectly confident that they could not successfully do it. Under the Irish system, where they had Roman Catholic teaching every day in the week, it was specially laid down that the Protestant children should not be present. If it were true that they could not do it on two days in the week by outsiders who might be indiscreet, how much less could they do it every morning in the week! For all these considerations he was bound, notwithstanding the fact that he sympathised with the hon. Member for the Brightside Division, to support Clause 6 of the Bill.

*MR. BRACE (Glamorganshire, S.) said that this was the first occasion on which he had ventured to intervene in the debates on the Education Bill, and he would not have done so now had it not been for the misunderstanding or misconception of the real position taken up by himself and others who supported Clause 6. It was true that a number of Labour Members had gone into the lobby in support of a purely secular education, but it was not because they were anti-religionists or because they did not believe in Bible teaching. Most of them spent their Sundays in endeavouring to teach the Bible in Sunday schools, and it was a mistake to say that they were not in direct sympathy with giving religious instruction to children. He supported Clause 6 as it stood, because he accepted it as the charter of freedom and liberty of conscience. They had heard a good deal about the rights of the minorities; indeed there had been a good deal of special pleading for the rights of minorities; but now they were asked to say that the minorities should have no rights, that it should be compulsory on the parents to send their children to school during the hour of religious instruction. The object of Clause 6 was to place the children in exactly the same position as the teachers. He knew something of the working classes of the country; he was a workman himself and the son of a workman, and when he heard hon. Gentlemen speak as they had done regarding the attitude of parents towards religious teaching it showed that those Members did not quite understand the problems they were discussing. He pleaded for Clause 6 as it stood, and he was sorry the Government had not come before the Committee supporting the clause with all the weight of a united Cabinet behind it. At the same time as there were a number of people in the country who had conscientious objections to certain forms of teaching, it was the duty of this House to protect them.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside) said it had been very clear during the debate what the motives were which inspired opposition against Clause 6. A large number of hon. Members disavowed the very plea on which they founded their objection to the secular Amendment. They were now told that a great majority were absolutely opposed to secular instruction, and yet they said they had no faith in the children being sent to school for religious teaching unless they were compelled. His contention was that Clause 6 was the one Clause in the Bill that carried the issue in the right direction. It was almost the one truly liberal clause in the Bill. He thought he knew something about theology, but when he came to this House as a politician he found himself in a Sanhedrim of amateur theologians in which the Bill was discussed less on political than on religious grounds. There was one exception, but of what value was that? It was said that there would be new facilities given, or new inducements to child labour. If that were true, it was an extremely important consideration; but what effort had been made by hon. Gentlemen who took up that position to give the Committee anything in the nature of political or statistical information on the subject? What did they, as politicians, know of what was happening in the matter of child labour, or of the real value of religious instruction in the schools? If they wanted to discuss the question of under-feeding they appointed a Committee or Commission to make inquiries; but had anybody proposed to appoint a Commission to inquire into the actual results of the instruction which had been given in schools on religious lines for the last 100 years? If a great majority of the Members of this House had been born in a Mohammedan country they themselves would have been Mohammedans. Nobody could dispute that. For instance, the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone would have been the most devout of Mullahs, and he believed the hon. Member for West Ham, despite his very pronounced ethical bias, to which he desired to pay a tribute, would have been very practically ethical on the lines of a good child of Islam. The beliefs which figured upon the floor of the House were political beliefs, but some hon. Members had given them confessions of faith. He respectfully deprecated all confessions of faith in that Assembly, as such confessions on the part of hon. Members holding positive forms of creed would justify countervailing ethical assertions, and yet how offensive those would be considered by hon. Members who were always giving them the assurances of their faith. He regretted that his hon. friend the Member for Leicester had given himself a certificate of spirituality in this matter, because they were not there to decide upon matters of spirituality. Surely they were present not as theologians but as politicians to decide these questions on political grounds. Clause 6 had the merit of being drawn on political grounds, and the only political consideration urged against it was that advanced by the hon. Member for Northampton, that it would not guard the children against the tendency of the worst class of parents to take their children from school and set them to work. Yet the conscience clause had not been taken advantage of for this purpose, and the worst class of parents were, in a variety of ways, under the influence of the Church missions. The opponents of the clause were trying to refuse one kind of political freedom to one of the best classes of parents. The Sermon on the Mount had been alluded to, and he would remind the Committee, therefore, that the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone, on a previous occasion, had said—a wonderful effort of tolerance—that he did not object to that, but that such teaching was absolutely worthless from the point of view of Christianity.

LORD R. CECIL thought the hon. Member was not quite fair. The point he had discussed was how far Christian faith was taught in the schools, and he had said that as a definition of Christian faith the Sermon on the Mount was not sufficient, although he might have used stronger words.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON said what the noble Lord wanted was not moral teaching in the schools, but dogmatic teaching.

LORD R. CECIL said he wanted both—Christian faith and conduct.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON asked whose fault it was that education in this country was backward? For at least 100 years all education had been kept back by the constant action of the Church of England. The Church of England had been the stone in the wool. In any country where there was a clearly dominant church, there education was backward relatively with other countries.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member was not speaking either to the Amendment or to the clause.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON said he would drop that argument as far as he could and would confine himself to the Amendment and the clause. He wished to express his regret at the loss the House had sustained by the death of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who had voted for the secular Amendment, and declared that the right way out of the theological wrangle, which was going on over the schools of this country, was to introduce secular education.

While the hon. Member was proceeding with his argument Mr. BELLOC (Salford, S.) on his way to his seat, passed between the hon. Member and the Chairman amidst cries of "order."

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. I must explain to hon. Members that when any Member is speaking on the first or second bench, they must not cross between the hon. Member and the Chair.

MR. BELLOC: I must apologise to the Committee for my ignorance of its rules.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON said that Clause 6 would save the country from the tyrannous consequences which would flow from his Bill under the facilities given by Clause 4. In a considerable number of schools there would in consequence of those facilities be no escape from absolutely dogmatic teaching save by way of Clause 6. Dogmatic teaching might be right or wrong. The Committee was not permitted to express any opinion upon that, but it was not education. Education consisted in the eliciting of the powers of a child's mind and teaching it how to use its reason. Therefore dogmatic teaching was non-educational teaching, while Clause 6 was primarily an educational clause. He ventured to deprecate the unfortunate line which had been taken by the hon Member for East Mayo, who, while he backed up the right of parents to settle for themselves the education of their children in regard to members of his own faith, now came forward with a suggestion to disregard the rights of other parents, and to interfere with their rights. What was the value of the moral teaching given in the fashion which the hon. Member wished it to be given, if the child was to be taunted and mocked at by the very people who were giving it? It had been suggested by some who supported the Amendment that it would be possible so to arrange that the children who were withheld from the religious teaching might get secular teaching during that time. But how would that operate? How had it operated in the past? The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education had indicated his knowledge of a number of cases. In his opinion the secular teaching given to the withdrawn child was a species of teaching that was repellant to the child and not meant to carry on his secular education in any way. And he could quite understand that; because if it was thought that the withdrawn child was gaining three-fourths of an hour's secular teaching beyond that which was given to the other children, the parents of the other children would at once complain that their children were losing that education which was given to the withdrawn child. So that any secular system of that kind would have the effect of creating teaching which was objectionable and repellant. Those who supported Clause 6 did so because they held with the right hon. Gentleman that it was essential

In the opinion of masses of people in this country "clericalism is the enemy," and he felt that the more strongly when he saw the hon. Member for East Mayo showing a disposition to join the other forces in this House to curtail the liberty of the layman. The hon. Gentleman the Parliamentary Secretary had adopted the phrase "clericalism is the enemy." But that phrase did not mean that the clergy were the enemy. It did not mean that every clergyman was an enemy. The word clericalism was an intensive term, and meant the domination of the clerical influence and the clerical spirit over the lay spirit. He hoped most Members of the House did protest against clericalism in that sense. It was because he protested against it in that sense that he supported the Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the two preceding speakers were among those who desired to see established in this country a purely secular system of education, and they, therefore, naturally supported Clause 6 in its present shape, and it certainly harmonised with the views they had laid before the Committee. But he confessed he had not been impressed by the strength of the arguments they had put forward. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had discovered two facts which rather startled him. The first was that the great enemy for 100 years to the cause of popular education in this country had been the Church of England—a statement which seemed to be belied by every passage in the history of the country. Any human being who looked into that history could see that the Church of England in the last 100 years, like the Church of Scotland in preceding centuries, had been the pioneer in the work of popular education, and had in that cause made infinite sacrifices, both pecuniary and other. Another discovery the hon. Gentleman had made had as little foundation in fact. It was that this Amendment was intended to help, and would have the effect of helping, the Church of England as distinguished from other denominations and other forms of religious teaching. The hon. Gentleman knew that the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone bitterly complained that the clause compelled Cowper-Temple teaching, and excluded the teaching of the Church of England and the Church of Rome. He thought his hon. friend had rather exaggerated his case, because the Amendment did not apply to Cowper-Temple teaching alone, but it did compel the attendance of children for Cowper-Temple teaching in what were now voluntary schools, on three days out of the five. How the hon. Gentlemen with these facts staring him in the face could tell the Committee that an Amendment moved by a Nonconformist Member on the other side of the House was an Amendment intended to bolster up the teaching of the Church of England and the Church of Rome passed his comprehension. The hon. Gentleman had drawn a distinction, the value of which he could not apprehend, between political considerations and other considerations, and he had told the Committee that if they had been born in a Mohammedan country they would all have been Mohammedans, or if they had been born in a Bhuddist country they would all have been Bhuddists. The hon. Gentleman must carry that reasoning very much further if he adopted it at all. He advocated the teaching of morals in the schools as opposed to religion. If the hon. Gentleman had been born in a different century and in a different country his morality might not have been of the high type it was now. He must extend his argument to secular education, because had he had the misfortune to have been born in a less enlightened century and a less enlightened country, his views would have been at variance with those which he inculcated on the generation in which he happened to have been born. The hon. Gentleman would forgive him for putting aside the whole of that portion of his argument. He had asked, and the hon. Member for Mid. Glamorgan had also used the argument, why they wanted to compel children to attend religious instruction, seeing that they told them that the mind of the country was made up that religion should not be banished from the schools. If the parents really took this strong view on religion, they argued they did not require any compulsion for their children to attend religious instruction. They valued religion, and that was a sufficient guarantee that the children would attend even if no compulsion was placed upon them. That was the argument, and hon. Gentlemen who used it must remember that when they talked in England of the country desiring a certain thing they meant the majority of the country. Nobody denied that there might be parents who objected to religious teaching altogether — careless, selfish parents, parents who were indifferent and did not consider what was best for their children. Were they to leave those classes altogether uncared for ? By this clause such parents would be allowed to have an option. The argument of the hon. Gentleman was clearly opposed to the policy adopted for secular education. The parents in this country were not allowed to say that their children should not have secular education. They were compelled to send their children to school. They could not be trusted not to allow selfishness, carelessness, indifference, and other things to stand in the way of the education of their children. The opponents of the clause based their argument on that. What was good for secular education was equally good for religious education. What they objected to was that by drawing distinctions between the two classes of education they would discredit in the eyes of the parents and in the public opinion of the country that part of education to which hon. Gentlemen opposite refused to apply that compulsion which they felt justified in applying to the other half of the educational system. The hon. Member for North Camberwell approached the same topic from a wholly different point of view, and advanced an argument which, he thought, was new in the debate. If he understood the hon. Gentleman, his point was that compulsion in matters of religion was tolerable so long as the system was in existence which this Bill would upset ; and it was tolerable because it was carried out by the elementary teachers. But now that that system was to be upset, now that elementary teachers were not to be allowed to deal with religion, now that it was to be handed over to the clergy of the various denominations, they would have a wholly new influence imported. They would find that the priest or the Nonconformist minister would take such an exaggerated view of those things which divided Christians that the whole religious harmony of a district, which could only be preserved if religion was taught by the teacher in the school, would be lost. He thought the hon. Gentleman would admit that that was a fair statement of his argument. With the conclusion that was to be derived from the speech of the hon. Member for North Camberwell—namely, that the teacher should be allowed to give the religious instruction—he was in entire agreement. He did not share the hon. Gentleman's apprehension of a great increase in sectarian bitterness should the clergyman be forced to come into the school to give religious instruction. But he agreed that in the circumstances it was best that the religious instruction, whether denominational or undenominational, should be given by the teacher, who was responsible for the discipline of the school and understood the art of teaching, which was an entirely different matter from the science of theology. The Minister for Education had left the clause to the Committee. For that proceeding there were examples, but it was not usual, and was only justified in the case of a question about which there was a strong difference of opinion in the Cabinet or among the supporters of the Government. But, though the right hon. Gentleman had left the question to the Committee, he had not concealed his own emphatic opinion in favour of the clause as it stood. The argument upon which the right hon. Gentleman really rested his defence of the clause was that of freedom of conscience. The hon. Member for the Louth Division of Lincolnshire took the same line, but in their development of the same argument they absolutely contradicted each other. The Minister for Education had said that to compel the minority in a school—presumably Nonconformists — to attend during the time of religious instruction, and then to require from the teacher differential treatment for them was to put the unfortunate children in a position which was cruel to those of sensitive minds, who dreaded being marked out from the rest of their schoolmates. But the argument of the hon. Member for the Louth Division was that while in the schools which he knew best, where the great mass of the children were Nonconformists, the majority would not press hardly upon the Church minority, in schools of another class the tyrannical squire or the intolerant parson would make the lives of Nonconformist parents a burden so bitter that they would not dare to obtain for their children that religious instruction which, left to themselves, they would naturally secure.

*MR. PERKS said the point he had tried to bring out was that, owing to the operation of Clause 3, national schools in Lincolnshire would have so strong a clerical atmosphere as to compel Nonconformist children attending them to adapt themselves to their form of religious teaching.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What a compliment to the Act of 1902! These evils which under the Act of 1902 were either avoided or reduced to relative insignificance were all brought back to full activity by Clause 3 of this Bill! The hon. Member for the Louth Division appeared to hold the view, which had been publicly expressed by Dr. Clifford or some other eminent Nonconformist Divine, that this Bill was far more clerical than the Act of 1902. When he remembered that there was to be compulsory Cowper-Temple teaching every day of the week in schools attended by Nonconformist majorities, he must say that that was an opinion rather unjust to the Bill. It was not his business to defend the Bill, but he thought the time had come when the right hon. Gentleman should obtain justice even from his friends. It had been pointed out that in the county council schools the question of conscience never came up, and that the idea that the denominational minorities attending them were oppressed was a complete delusion. The same thing was exactly true of voluntary schools. There was no conscience difficulty in these schools. In truth, the idea that the minority of children in the one class of school or the other was going to be made miserable had no foundation in fact, and ought not to be allowed to influence the decision of the Committee in regard to the clause. He could not conceive how hon. Members opposite who believed in religious instruction forming part of the country's national system of education could consistently vote against the Amendment. How was it possible for them to defend their view of the position which religion should hold in elementary education if they drew a distinction between secular and religious subjects, and said that, while the teaching of the first must be compulsory, the teaching of the other must be voluntary? Such an attitude would inevitably lead to the destruction of that blending of religion with education which for forty years the strongest efforts of the House had been directed to make an indestructible part of the social life of the people. The Members of the House who believed in a purely secular system of education were a small minority. Every other section of the House, undenominational or denominational, so long as they were in favour of religious teaching in the schools, were bound to support the Amendment. He found it difficult to believe that any Member who voted against the Amendment either fully understood its consequences or really entertained the view that religion was a necessary element of national welfare, and consequently should form part of the elementary education of the children of the country.

*MR. H. R. MANSFIELD (Lincolnshire Spalding) said he was afraid that Members from Ireland who supported the Amendment had lost sight of the fact that there were hundreds of rural villages in England in which there were no Roman Catholic schools, and that the clause would be a distinct help to the Catholics residing in such villages. Under present conditions Catholics so situated were forced to take the Anglican teaching or occupy an invidious position under the conscience clause. But under Clause 6 they would be able to keep their children from school during the hour of religious instruction. He was astonished that the Anglican section of the community did not welcome Clause 6. In view of what had been said in the course of the debates respecting Cowper-Temple teaching, he would have thought that those who objected to that form of instruction would have been glad of the opportunity which the clause would secure to them of preventing their children receiving it. Speaking on behalf of the agricultural labourers, many of whom lived in his constituency, he said that many labourers were Nonconformists, but such men were without the powerful organisations which Anglican and Catholics had behind them to investigate their grievances. The Nonconformist labourer was weak, and his views were often inarticulate, although his religion was to him as dear as—and probably much dearer—than was the religion of the dweller in the town to him. His chances of success in life were practically nil, and if he was a religious man he looked forward to another life in which things might be more equal. Being often of the same religion as his father, he desired that his children should be of the same religion as himself. Up to the present he had been under the operation of the conscience clause. If Clause 6 were eliminated he would be driven back upon that. He believed that would be a calamity. He had nothing to say against the conscience clause except that it had been of no use. He once spoke in a village school, and when he had finished the clergyman and the schoolmaster pointed out to him high up on the wall a dirty placard which turned out to be a copy of the conscience clause. He said at the time that it seemed to him that no one had ever read it, and he was told that there was no religious difficulty in that village. The fact was children did not like to be put in an invidious position; and under that clause parents were often put in not only an invidious but a dangerous position. The children had first to bear the brunt, and if the father chose to over-ride the child and stand by the conscience clause, then he himself had very often to run the gauntlet. It was all very well to say that these tyrannical employers did not exist, but they did, and men had now often to pay the price of their convictions, and if they asked for the operation of the present conscience clause they had to pay a price which they were little able to bear. He agreed with the Minister for Education that no conscience clause was worth anything unless it carried with it the right to withdraw a child during the time of religious instruction. They asked for Clause 6 as it stood, because they felt that it brought freedom for the Anglican against simple Bible teaching, freedom for the Catholic against Protestant teaching, freedom for the Nonconformist against sectarian teaching, and freedom for the secularist against any religious teaching at all. It was because they believed it paved the way for freedom that they wanted to adhere to the clause as it stood. The hon. Member for the Basingstoke Division had said that Clause 4 was jerrymandered by the Nonconformist in the interest of the Roman Catholics. This was not so; the Nonconformist did not like and did not want Clause 4. Hon. Members opposite ought not to speak of jerrymandering after that exhibition of it which was given in the wear and tear Amendment. He thought that the only people in danger of jerrymandering were the parents. The rights of the parent had been put forward in aid of denominational teaching, but now that the whole matter was proposed to be left to the parent they were being told that Parliament must decide the matter. They did not think that the parent had a right to demand a certain teaching, but they did say that he had a right to say that he would not have some other teaching. They asked that the parents should have liberty in this matter; if there was to be any compulsion of the child it ought to be the direct act of the parent and not of the State. He hoped the Committee would stand by this clause. They were asking for justice to the agricultural and other labourers, and he trusted there would be an overwhelming vote in favour of freedom to all classes and sections of the community, which would be secured by leaving this question of religion for the parents themselves to decide.

MR SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall), in supporting the Amendment, said the question appeared to him to be whether religious instruction was to continue to be compulsory during school hours. He represented a city where the Act of 1902 had been a very great success, because both political Parties made up their minds to lay aside their religious differences and work for the benefit of the children alone. The result was that good feeling had prevailed between the education committee and the managers of voluntary schools. He had asked the Archdeacon of Sheffield what would be the result in the voluntary schools if Clause 6 were carried, and he had replied that by taking religious teaching outside school hours and leaving it optional they were doing a cruel injury to the children of careless parents whose children needed religious instruction most. The Archdeacon further stated that by this clause they would be putting a premium upon non-attendance; that parents would be tempted to keep their boys at home to work and girls would be wanted at home by their mothers; and the children would prefer to play. The result would be that the bulk of the children would never learn any religion at all. What had happened in America? There pressure was brought to bear on account of sectarian animosities and denominational teaching was taken away from the schools. Pari passu with this the attendance at the Sunday schools in America dropped off. The President of the Board of Education said he wanted to make the conscience clause a reality. It had been a reality. The children had not been withdrawn from the schools during religious instruction because they had no real reason for withdrawing them. From inquiries made of the teachers in the thirty-five voluntary Church schools of Sheffield—many of whom had been in the schools for thirty or forty years—as to whether children had been withdrawn during their terms of office it appeared that, with the exception of a few Jews, not a single child had been withdrawn. The Minister for Education said it was possible that the parents did not withdraw their children because they did not wish to place them in an invidious position. Surely the conscience of a parent could not be very sensitive if that were allowed to stand in the way of withdrawing a child from the religious instruction. A former Member of this House who sat on the Opposition side in the last Parliament said to him the other day—

> "The House of Commons is engaged in seeing what is the minimum of religious education that may be given in the schools. Though our Master said, 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature,' you are trying how little you can teach to the children who are afterwards to be the manhood and womanhood of England."

Mr. ROGERS (Wiltshire, Devizes) said that since the passing of the Act of 1902 he had been engaged one day a week in the working of the Act in his own county. He felt that Clause 6 raised an exceedingly important question from the point of view of administration. The working out of this Bill when it became law would devolve entirely on the local authorities, and he submitted that nothing should be done to make it more difficult for them to carry out the important and arduous duties with which they were entrusted. He disliked Clause 6 because it said that religious instruction was to be outside of school hours, and that it was to form no part of the normal life of the day schools. He submitted that that was not in accordance with the scheme of the Government. The Bill, as he understood it, was based on the principle of undenominationalism, He had heard a number of speeches from the Treasury Bench defending the Bill on the lines of simple Bible teaching. It seemed to him that if it was right to instigate and encourage a local authority to give simple Bible teaching power ought to be given to make that teaching part of the normal curriculum of the school. Under Clause 6 they were not doing that. It was left entirely an open matter. From the point of view of the discipline of the school he could not disguise from himself the strong conviction that the effect of making the religious teaching outside the school hours would be that the children would come in between nine o'clock and a quarter to ten in irregular batches. That would utterly destroy the common life of the school during the three quarters of an hour, and if the children came in from time to time it would be impossible for the teacher to give them proper instruction. The alternative was to make the children stay outside the school till a quarter to ten. In the case of village schools to which the children came long distances it would be to keep them outside until the first lesson was over. From the point of view of discipline, therefore, Clause 6 would not be an improvement. Having the greatest possible sympathy with the principle of religious freedom, he did not think the present conscience clause had worked in a satisfactory manner in the great majority of cases. If a Nonconformist child was withdrawn from the ordinary religious teaching and given the multiplication table to learn in the corner of the classroom, that was an invidious and detestable position in which to put a small child. The way to make the clause effective was to allow the children to be withdrawn not only from the class but also from the premises. He thought that trouble had come because under the Act of 1870 the conscience clause was interpreted as only allowing withdrawal from the class and not from the premises. There were exceptions to that at the present time. Under the by-law children were withdrawn from the school premises, provided that their parents asked permission in writing. So far as he was aware, the local authority had not insisted on any form of religious instruction being given by the parents. He thought it would be impossible for any local authority to follow a child to its home, or to cross-examine a child as to what it was doing during the time it was withdrawn. There were schools which had so few rooms that there was no place in which a child could be put when withdrawn from religious instruction. He contended that it should be possible to withdraw the children from the premises as well as from the class if proper protection was to be given. It was obvious that under the new Bill the conscience clause would not be required in so many cases as hitherto. If a parent desired to withdraw his child from a Church school where teaching was of a particular character, there would always be the alternative of Cowper-Temple teaching, and he did not anticipate that there would be the same urgency for the operations of the conscience clause in future. If his hon. friend the Member for the Brightside Division could see his way to add to his Amendment some Amendment on the lines of the one of which he himself had given notice he thought it would meet the case.† He was not inclined to think that the question of child labour was very much more than a bogey. If it was more than that it ought to be dealt with by legislation passed for the regulation of the employment of children. If a parent was put under the obligation of writing to the local authority claiming exemption for his child on conscientious grounds, he did not fancy a parent would do that in order to get his child put to work. He was certain that a conscientious objection would only be taken by a parent who felt strongly on the subject. He thought the clause as it stood was a danger to discipline and would hamper the local education authority in maintaining the efficiency of its education. He believed the local education authority should have the opportunity of making religious instruction part of the normal life of the school.

*MR. G. GREENWOOD (Peterborough) said they were all agreed in wanting to see a final settlement of this question, so far as there could be finality in mundane affairs. Above all, they were agreed in wishing to see an end of those deplorable disputes and controversies concerning dogma and doctrine which were an injury to the great cause of national education which they all had at heart, or which they all professed to have at heart. But they would never see that finality, that end to disputes and controversies unless the question was settled on sound and intelligible principles —principles that would secure that strict and impartial justice was meted out to every section of the community so that no majority would be able to oppress any minority in the country however numerically insignificant that minority might be. What was the principle for which the passive resisters had been so long and strenuously contending? It was that no man ought to be compelled by law to pay for the support of any religious teaching to which he was conscientiously opposed. That seemed to him a most admirable principle, and should be taken as a first principle in this matter. It seemed to him an odious thing to use all the powers of the State to coerce a man to pay for religious teaching of which he conscientiously disapproved. But if he was right in that, what was the result? We had now quartered all our public elementary schools comfortably on the rates and taxes, and the State levied rates and taxes with the most sublime impartiality from every citizen, without asking him what was his religious belief, or even if he had any religious belief at all. What would happen when this Bill became law? They would be taxing thousands of their fellow-countrymen in order to compel them to pay for religious teaching of which they disapproved, in direct violation of the principle which he had ventured to lay down, the principle for which the passive resisters had contended, and every passive resister who—he did not say supported this Bill, because the Bill was an immense improvement on the Act of 1902—but who actively supported the teaching of religion in State schools at public expense, would show that, consciously or unconsciously, he had been only fighting for his own hand, and was now ready to throw on others the very burden against which he had so loudly protested when it was laid on his own shoulders. They had heard a great deal from the benches opposite about the right of parents. It was said that a parent had a right to have his children brought up in his own religion. That came rather remarkably from the Party which, for a quarter of a century, had opposed, tooth and nail, the enactment of a conscience clause, and had said in effect to every parent in rural districts "You must send your children to Church schools to be educated in the doctrines of the Church of England, unless you are content to leave them without any secular education at all." A parent had a right to bring up his children in his own religion, but he had not a right to demand that his children should be educated in any religion he pleased at the State expense, otherwise this country would have to embark in a gigantic system of concurrent endowment which would embrace not only all forms and varieties of Christianity, but which must also in justice comprehend many other shades and varieties of faith not excluding the ethical societies. The parent had no right to demand that his child should be brought up in any religion he chose at the State expense. The only right of the parent in this connection was that his children should not be taught in the State school any religion of which he disapproved. The case was put admirably by the present Secretary for India in a book published in 1873 on National education—

† The Amendment referred to was to add at the end of the Amendment under discussion, "and provided that when a parent has notified to the managers in writing his intention to withdraw the child from the schoolhouse during the time allotted to such religious observation or instruction, he shall not be under any obligation to cause the child to attend at such schoolhouse, except during the times allotted in the time-table exclusively to secular instruction.'

> "The answer was simple and obvious. Parents have an inalienable right to choose the kind of religious instruction which their children shall receive. No one disputes that. Our simple contention is that along with this right of choosing their religious instruction goes the duty of paying for it. If I say to the parent, 'your child shall not be allowed to receive instruction in Catholic doctrine, or in Baptist doctrine,' I am a tyrant. If the parent should say to me, 'I insist that you shall pay for instructing my child in doctrines which you do not accept,' then it is he who is the tyrant. Yet nothing less than this is involved in the present educational system. We are teaching the religion of some with money raised by the taxation of all."

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

> "Writers for the newspapers, who had not always time to think about the terms they use, have the face to insist that we are for depriving the majority of the community of the right of giving their children a religious education. What we really seek is to deprive the majority of the right of making the minority pay for giving this education to other people's children. . . . We are next told that the ratepayers, when asked to speak for themselves, reply all over the kingdom by overwhelming majorities, as if, in religious affairs it were not a settled principle of our Government that the majority, however great it may be, and however strenuous its convictions, shall still not force the conscience of the minority. We force Quakers to pay for war, and Peculiar People to call in doctors; but the protection of the Realm and the protection of life are secular ends, not religious ends, like teaching catechism."

He held that that was a perfectly good and logical distinction, and he was surprised that hon. Gentlemen supported the proposition that if they were entitled to have compulsory secular instruction, they were entitled to have compulsory religious instruction also. The conscience clause was an admission that they were teaching in State schools what they had no right to teach compulsorily. In regard to the difference between secular and religious education, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India in his book was wholly admirable, and he could have wished that it had been in the hands of every Member in the House before these debates came on. The author said—

> "Secular instruction is one thing, and religious instruction is something quite different; no one who accepts Government aid on condition of a conscience clause can deny this absolute separation. The State has no more to do with the provision of religious instruction than it has to do with the provision of a band of music for each parish. That is the affair of those who want music, or who want religious instruction. There is no prohibition nor wish to prohibit. There is only absolute neutrality and indifference."

As one who had long been in favour of the "secular solution" he could not wholly approve of the Bill, but at least he thought they were entitled to have an efficient conscience clause, and the President of the Board had clearly demonstrated, and had enforced his argument by an appeal to his own school experience, that they could not have an efficient conscience clause unless this clause remained intact. If it were otherwise the children who claimed the benefit of the conscience clause at the school would have to submit to be called "little atheists" or "little agnostics." The hon. Member for Northampton had sneered at the term "agnostic," but for himself he deprecated controversy of that sort because, as had been said by an hon. friend of his before, it might lead to retaliation and to the discussion of questions which could not properly be discussed in this House. He would content himself therefore with saying that the hon. Member for Northampton appeared to have forgotten his Greek. "Agnostic" was a perfectly good word, which had been introduced by Professor Huxley. The "gnostic" was the man who professed to know all things, and the agnostic was the man who said he did not know. He was very glad to see that the new Code included provisions for definite moral instruction as part of the secular work, such as the duty of kindness to animals. He had no hesitation in saying that was more valuable instruction for the child, and more truly religious than the teaching of certain stories which some of the greatest scholars within the Church itself told them might be dismissed as mythology. He supported this clause, not because it was logical—he was aware that nobody cared a straw for logic in matters political, and still less in matters theological—but because it was just, and he would never believe that that which was consonant to justice could be at variance with true religion.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.) said that no doubt the State, having collected the rates and taxes, did not consider very much what religion was taught in the schools. His view, however, was that the people had a right to say that the money they paid should be disbursed in a way of which they approved. It was said that the conscience clause had been in this country for many years inoperative, but supposing that to have been the case—a very large assumption—would not the influence of the local authority have considerable bearing in regard to the operation of this conscience clause? The Catholics had no reason to complain of the operation of the conscience clause, loose as it was, and he was sure they would never have reason to do so. Their objection to this clause was that it placed religious education in a secondary position. They regarded religious and moral teaching as of far more importance than the secular part of education, and they could not assent to any proposal which placed religious and moral teaching upon a secondary plane. For himself he thought the local authority would be able to see that the conscience clause became a reality.

*MR. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) said he did not think it could be disputed that the object which the Government had in view in introducing this clause had been to incorporate in the Bill a genuine conscience clause, which all of them on the Ministerial side of the House claimed to be necessary. Hon. Members opposite scarcely realised how Nonconformists felt upon this question, and without for one moment suggesting that the clergy and the teachers employed in the voluntary schools of the country had distinctly set themselves to inculcate doctrines which they believed to be regarded as false by many of the parents of the children, yet it was the fact that their fidelity in presenting various aspects of Church teaching had offended the feelings of a very large number of parents. The doctrines which were taught under the word Church in the Creed included that of the Apostolic succession, and in regard to that and other matters there should, he thought, be greater security under the conscience clause in future than there had been in the past. But whilst holding that view he would ask whether they might not, in endeavouring to obtain relief from the intolerance which had obtained in the past, be going too far in accepting this clause. He admitted that in regard to the undenominational and secular aspect of school life the irregularity of attendance might demand very careful consideration. It was possible, quite apart from the action of the parents, that the children themselves might play truant, and as the Committee had decided in favour of religious instruction being continued in the schools the question was whether as a matter of practical politics they could not secure a position which would prevent them from drifting into a purely secular system. It seemed to him that if the Government were to adopt the Amendment now before the Committee amended by the omission of the word "secular" and the substitution of the words "in such pure and simple ethics and moral order as shall be approved by the education authority," and at the same time make the Anson by-law obligatory, they might arrive at a solution of the question. They would then have three alternatives which would provide for religious instruction as part and parcel of the ordinary school curriculum subject to the restrictions of this real conscience clause which would not permit children whose parents did not desire it to participate in it. If they took the case it provided for, they had a provision to bring the child to school at nine in the morning, and if the parent did not desire his child to receive religious instruction the child was to be put into another place to receive alternative, not secular instruction. If the Anson by-law was made obligatory all that the parent would have to do would be to write a letter to the schoolmaster and the child would be absolved from attendance. That would enable those who desired no religious instruction to be given to their children to be satisfied, and it would allow those persons who did desire their children to have special religious instruction to have their children taken by the clergyman or the priest and given special instruction in the Church or some other place. Whilst as a Nonconformist he urged the claim of unsectarian education he wished to be perfectly fair to the consciences of others. If this by-law was made obligatory they would make the Bill very much more satisfactory in its working in the country, because there would be no reason for those who objected to it adopting the policy of passive resistance—which it was said they might be compelled to adopt. Thus the children might have religious instruction different in degree; it might be the Cowper-Temple teaching for five days a week, or on the other hand they might have dogmatic teaching on two days in the week supplemented by the Cowper-Temple teaching on three days in the week, or in the four-fifths schools sectarian teaching five day a week, or the children might not come at all. He would rather take the risk under these conditions of unfair influences being brought to bear on the children than he would willingly consent to a system which would exclude religion from the schools. He should therefore support the Amendment of his hon. friend and would try to vary it in the manner he had indicated.

*Mr. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) said he rose to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Brightside Division, which he hoped would receive the hearty support of the Committee. It did not entirely meet the views of those with whom he sat, but it went, as they believed, a long way towards removing what they held would be very mischievous in the clause as it now stood. He desired to associate himself with the hon. Baronet who recently spoke from below the gangway in this matter. In their opinion religious instruction was absolutely vital for the happiness of the children and must be given under the most favourable conditions. It had in their opinion to be kept close to secular education in order that there might be no sense, in the mind of the child, of its being divorced from secular education. They wanted religious and secular education to be given together in the school so that the child should be impregnated with the religion for which they had all striven during all these years. All that was not to be had in this Amendment, but it went some way towards it. The clause, as it stood, practically destroyed that for which they were contending. There were some, he knew, who felt that if increased facilities were given to children to avoid certain things they would immediately go and do them, but that was not his experience. If they made it easier for people to keep their children away from religious instruction were they acting wisely? It seemed to them that the clause was bent upon destroying all religious instruction in the schools and it was because of that that they felt so strongly about it. But they felt, quite apart from that, that religious instruction should have the first place, and they would not be satisfied with its being put at the end of the morning or squeezed into an odd half-hour in the afternoon. They believed it should come first and be made the most important of all, and tone the whole education which the children received. They believed that if religious instruction was taken out of the school hours the impression on the child's mind would be that religious instruction was inferior to that which they were receiving in the school. Another point they did not lose sight of was that religious instruction being given largely and chiefly by the teachers themselves gave the teachers on the one hand an immense leverage over the children, and on the other influenced the children very much in accepting the teaching. He knew that vast numbers of teachers in this country would strongly oppose any attempt to prevent their giving religious instruction to their children, because they knew the power of it. If, as the hon. Member for North Camberwell had told them, the most effective instruction that he had given was given not in connection with the Bible, but in connection with certain moral lessons it certainly was not the fault of the Bible. Those with whom he had the honour to sit recognised that in the Scripture lessons there was the power of God to enable the child to absorb them, but no one would suggest that there was such a power behind mere moral maxims. And it was because there was this power behind religious teaching that they insisted upon it, and that they, with God's help, would see that it should have the first place in the school; that it should be the paramount influence in the school life of the children. The hon. Member for North Camberwell had also said that the great reason why children were not withdrawn under the conscience clause was that the parents had confidence in the teachers. He believed that was true, because up to now they had been able to ascertain that the teachers believed in the divine truths which they were called upon to teach. He would just like to say a word on the subject of some observations which fell from the hon. Member for one of the divisions of Northumberland. The hon. Gentleman deprecated their taking up a religious ground on this subject, and said that the Bill was political. He, however, thought it was very difficult altogether to divorce the political from the religious on most occasions, and he was not sure that it was desirable that they should do so. He thought, at any rate, that the moral, if not the religious side, of legislation, ought to be considered, and he was certain that as a rule it was considered by hon. Members in this House. He protested at all events against the idea that this Bill was to be separated in their minds from religious considerations. Then the same hon. Member had spoken of education as being the drawing out of the powers of the child's mind. The hon. Gentleman apparently thought that that was all that they should expect of education. Many of them claimed that education, to be worth its name, must draw out all the powers of the child.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the remarks of the hon. Gentleman were very general and were not confined to the Amendment.

*Mr. CARLILE said he was merely trying to explain why they laid so much stress upon the importance of the spiritual nature of the child. The hon. Member for West Ham said his faith was strong that religion would be continued in the schools, but he did not give any reason for the hope that was in him, excepting his faith in something that might happen in the future which would lead to the maintenance of religious instruction, notwithstanding the fact that he would make it extremely easy for parents to keep their children away from religious instruction, and for children to avoid it. They did not believe in the view held by the hon. Gentleman, and therefore for the most part he believed hon. Members on the Opposition side and those below the Gangway would support the Amendment.

*Mr. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) said the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had asked the Committee to combine their religion and politics in a most extraordinary fashion, but he seemed to have forgotten one point, and that was that His Majesty's Government had left it an absolutely open question. There was no question of Liberal or of Tory so far as this clause and Amendment were concerned, and he thought the Government had been very well advised in their action because there was nothing of a departmental nature whatever about the Amendment or the clause. The knowledge which was necessary for anyone to come to a conclusion was as open to any humble Member of this House as it was to the Minister for Education himself. The Amendment was rather an extraordinary one. It was proposed by a Nonconformist and supported by Roman Catholics and by Members of the Anglican Church. That fact in itself showed that it had nothing whatever to do with various denominations. In his opinion, the point at issue with regard to this Amendment was whether they were in favour of religious education or a secular system of education. The hon. Member for Northampton had poured scorn on what he was pleased to call the doctrine of mandate. He would not go into the question of mandate now, but this he would say, that every hon. Member when it did not conflict with his conscientious feelings liked to do what the majority of his constituents desired, and he was quite certain that the majority of his constituents desired religion to be taught in the school and the hours of teaching to be made compulsory, of course subject to the conscience clause. He did not think the conscience clause was satisfactory at the present time, and he would like to see the Minister for Education brace it up as much as was necessary. If they passed the clause as it stood and refused to accept the Amendment they would be putting all the delights of playtime in competition with religious teaching. It would be a very extraordinary child that did not prefer to play games rather than be taught religion or anything else. Another fact to be remembered with regard to this clause was that they were, in the case of the towns at any rate, putting the desire of gain in the minds of parents. In all our large towns children of ten or eleven years of age might easily earn a few coppers in the time given to religious instruction, and he would sincerely regret if that should happen. So far as council schools in the rural districts were concerned, religious teaching was entirely under the Cowper-Temple Clause, and, where a school under this Bill would be a transferred voluntary school, on three days of the week there would be Cowper-Temple instruction, and on other two days denominational teaching, but he also hoped that on these two days there would be the alternative of Cowper-Temple teaching to those children who desired it. He hoped that that would be made sure on the Report stage of the Bill; if it were he did not think any one, whatever his denomination, could have a grievance if religious education were made compulsory. The hon. Member for North Camberwell said he found in the course of his experience as a school master that more good was done incidentally during the days' teaching than during the time of the religious lesson. Surely if that were an argument at all it was an argument for abolishing all forms of religious teaching at the opening of school, and that proved that the issue was really one between secular education and religious education, and therefore he for his part intended to vote for the Amendment and against the clause.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) said he should vote for the Amendment and against the clause. The clause would really operate quite differently from what seemed to be generally thought in the Committee. It would have the fate of the conscience clause, and would remain absolutely inoperative; in fact it was only a conscience clause in another form. Why was the conscience clause a dead letter? It was said that the people were afraid of exercising their rights under it because they were afraid of tyranny. That at any rate did not account for it in his part of the country. Nobody would say that a Lancashire cotton spinner was afraid of anybody, and he was sure he would not be afraid of any parson. What was the strongest force which affected people generally in regard to this matter? It was not superstition but habit. The working classes were in the habit of doing this and that, and the last thing they would ever think of was doing something that was contrary to the habits in which they had been brought up. For more than thirty years it had been the habit of the people to send their children to school at nine o'clock in the morning, and they thought that was the proper time. In Lancashire, where the fathers and mothers got up at 5.30 in the morning, it would be preposterous to suggest to them that the time to send their children to school was 9.45, for that would be turning the whole thing into ridicule. This clause would become an absolute dead letter for the very same reason that the conscience clause had become a dead letter. The great mass of people would continue to send their children to school at nine o'clock and only the bad parents would take advantage of this clause in order to utilise the labour of their children. The result would be that all these children who went to school at nine o'clock would have to receive this religious education because there was nothing else for them. He thought the chidren ought to have the choice of a good secular teaching beginning at nine o'clock. They had heard so much about education and conscience that he was disposed to become quite frivolous, for he was sick of the whole thing. He wanted to look at the matter from the 'bus driver's point of view or the point of view of ordinary people. He was an employer of labour himself, and he found that all sorts of reasons were given for sending children to a particular school, but he never heard one give the religious view. Let them drop all this talk about conscience and give them an alternative at nine o'clock. It was nonsense to lose the best part of the morning. They had been asked to consider the education of the children, but they appeared to him to be always forgetting that. From the point of view of the children, could any hon. Member deny that nine o'clock was late enough to commence school? It was nonsense to begin school later than that hour. They ought to give the children a choice. Let them give the parents the alternative of sending their children to religious teaching from 9 to 9.45 or some other teaching. Give them a fair choice and abide by the result. This clause would play into the hands of exclusive religious teaching. It would also play into the hands of the improvident, careless parent and would deprive the children of the most valuable three-quarters of an hour during the day.

LORD BALCARRES said the hon. Member had under-estimated the danger to the children from improvident and careless parents. The Minister for Education had recognised that difficulty. It would not be easy to strengthen the law to meet that danger. He would support the Amendment because he wanted to see religious instruction given distinctly within school hours. Clause 6 as it stood distinctly put religious instruction outside school hours, or, at all events, made attendance thereat unnecessary. In some schools religious instruction was not by any means confined to the beginning of the day. There were schools in Lincolnshire where it was given on four separate occasions during the day, and if the children were free to come and go upon those occasions there must inevitably be confusion and disorganisation, which in itself must be bad for discipline. In the Code which had just been issued it was laid down that football and rounders should, under certain conditions, be put within school hours. He was all for putting rounders within school hours, but he was equally for including religious instruction within school hours. The one was at least as important as the other, and he was quite certain that, however the public might regard Clause 1 and the other great operative clauses of the Bill, it would prefer that this clause should be excluded. He sincerely trusted that the Committee would either amend the clause in the direction proposed by the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield or exclude it altogether.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.) said he came down to the House with the intention of supporting the clause, but he found such omissions in the speech of his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education that he felt that, on the whole, the difficulties which surrounded the insertion of the clause were greater than were fully realised. The speech of his right hon. friend omitted to meet the question of discipline in the schools and the difficulties of child labour, which were very much more real in the rural districts of England than seemed to be realised. He thought difficulty would arise in the working of the clause on account of the different times at which little children in the rural districts would leave the scattered cottages in which they lived. That was a small point in the minds of Members of this House, but it loomed largely in the imagination of the parents of the children in the districts, and it was one which could not be omitted in considering the administration of the Bill. As to child labour, he thought that a great many Members of the House were not fully alive to the extent to which it was practised in the rural districts of England, and especially in the small towns. About a year and a half ago he went into the question of child labour as practised in Wiltshire. There were two inquiries, the first being held through the agency of the police. The representatives of the police said there was no great amount of child labour in the county. That Report was not regarded as satisfactory and application was made to the school teachers and the school attendance officers for information as to the conditions under which the children lived. Their Reports entirely reversed the evidence given by the police. It was pointed out that the selling of milk and newspapers was indulged in to a great and growing degree by parents at the expense of the children up to the hour when the schools were opened. The county council made by-laws which prohibited the employment of children in all the cases they could touch up to forty minutes before the hour for the schools opening. If the regular hour for opening the school was postponed till a quarter to ten, there might be an extension of this child labour which was most deleterious from the point of view of education. It might be said that the parents who drew a profit—he would say a wicked profit—from the labour of young children were few. The information obtained from the teachers was that this was not so. However well acquainted the hon. Member for Tyneside might be with the conditions in great industrial towns, he could not be acquainted with the industrial conditions in the rural districts, for otherwise he would not have minimised the question of child labour in the way he had done. Hon. Gentlemen who had declared themselves secularists had had the courage to vote against the Government. Let those who were in favour of some religious instruction in the schools also have the courage of their convictions. If it was right that there should be religious instruction, they should not have a clause like this. For these reasons he found himself, somewhat against his will, bound to vote against the clause.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington) said this was one of the most important questions that had ever been placed before the House of Commons, and he believed the right hon. Gentleman, in allowing the Committee to give a free decision, had done the right thing. The case of the Shalford schools in Surrey showed conclusively that if children were given the option whether they should go to school or not they did not go. A Church school at Shalford was transferred to an association under lease on the condition that the trustees might provide what religious teaching they liked prior to 9.45, but neither children nor teachers were obliged to be at the school prior to that hour. The vicar and curate taught regularly, but the limit of attendance at the voluntary religious lessons was unsatisfactory. The system was found to encourage irregularity and unpunctuality, the results of the teaching were disappointing, and the system was considered so detrimental to the school as an educational machine that when the lease fell in the county council officials declined to entertain the idea of continuing it on the same terms. What they wished to see taught in the schools of this country was the Christian religion—not something which might equally well be Mohammedanism. It was impossible to look at this great question entirely from the political point of view; they must to some extent look at it from the point of view of their faith. He hoped the Amendment would be carried by a large majority.

MR. ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton) said he looked at this question not only on religious grounds, but still more largely on educational grounds. He must confess that he had never himself been an advocate of excessive religious instruction in the schools. In his own district they had religious instruction for one hour on Mondays. He was unable to see why, if two hours religious instruction a week sufficed in public schools, the children in elementary schools should require more. He himself considered that the extra time might be made better use of in the secular education of the children. He had always felt that the Sunday school and the home ought to do most of the religious instruction of the children. At the same time, in the great towns where there was a residuum of the population, and where the parents did not care whether their children got any religious instruction at all, these children should have a chance of receiving some religious instruction. But it was not mainly from the religious aspect that he viewed this question and proposed to vote against the clause. It was on educational grounds. He agreed very largely with what his hon. friend the Member for East Bristol had said about the waste of educational time if the children were not compelled to go to school at nine o'clock to have some kind of instruction. There was another view. The children withdrawn from religious instruction would be wasting their time in the streets or in the fields for three-quarters of an hour every day while the other children, who were receiving religious instruction, were at any rate learning something, and their minds were being trained. Another aspect of the question was that the State would lose. They were spending enormous sums of money on these schools, but there would be a great waste of the State money if for three-quarters of an hour every day the schools and the teachers were not employed in doing the work of education for the withdrawn children. He admitted that there was a certain amount of risk of the children withdrawn from religious instruction having the finger of scorn pointed at them, and possibly being called atheists, but he thought that the chances at this time of day of the parson or the teacher treating the children as Nonconformists, as they used to do, were limited indeed. In the first place, this Bill would put the clergyman in a very different position from that which he occupied when he was the only manager; and in the case of teachers they had now become servants of the State, and servants of the county, and they would find political influences in their way which they did not in the old times.

MR. WALTERS rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hants, Basingstoke) said he approached this matter from the point of view of the interests of denominational teaching. The result which he would like to see emerge from all the turmoil of these discussions was the equal giving of definite denominational instruction to all denominations in all public elementary schools. From that point of view he should have no difficulty whatever in supporting this Amendment, were it not for the form which Clauses 3 and 4 of this Bill had for the moment assumed. Let the Committee consider how unsatisfactory would be the religious teaching in the schools as those clauses now stood. He confessed that he was in some doubt as to whether he ought to assist in making attendance compulsory during the time of such teaching. This clause to him seemed to be directed not against denominational but against religious teaching. The schools would be open, the time tables in force, religious teaching would be going forward or would be offered, and under those circumstances he was asked to say that the attendance of the children should be optional. It seemed to him that some of the strongest reasons which might be urged against Clause 6 had very little to do with education, and nothing at all to do with religion. He thought it would be very injurious to the discipline of the school if a lesson given by one of the teachers might or might not be attended by any child as he pleased. The system of elementary education should be as invariable as possible. The school should be opened and closed at fixed hours, and all the children should be compelled to attend between those hours. He was opposed to making any subject in the elementary schools optional; and if they sought for any subject to make optional, religious instruction was the last they should select. To make the best of a bad business, the better solution was that if any parent desired to withdraw his child from religious teaching he should be at liberty to do so under the conscience clause. If he desired to withdraw his child in order that it should have better religious teaching elsewhere, he should be in a position to do so. But unless a parent desired to avail himself of one or the other of those rights religious teaching should be compulsory. He supported the Amendment.

*Mr. ADKINS (Lancashire, Middleton) said he heartily supported Clause 6 as against the Amendment and he hoped it was possible for every member of the Committee to do that without being a traitor to educational efficiency or disregarding the conscientious opinion of other Members. The intention of Clause 6 was to make religious education an optional matter, and that only those children should have it whose parents desired it. The moment they went beyond that obvious principle they were at once involved in using State machinery for the formulation of ideas and for the enforcement of religious principles which were actively opposed or only discontentedly acquiesced in by parents whose children had those lessons. The hon. Member for the Luton Division of Bedfordshire had admitted most candidly that if they had compulsory religious lessons in the school the minority of children who did not take them but who, under the Amendment, would be obliged to have arithmetic or something else of a special character, would be at a great disadvantage. If there was not enough secular education taught in the school, then let them have courage enough to make it more. A child who was taught arithmetic instead of religion would get ahead and put the others to a disadvantage. He thought the proper solution of this difficult question was to allow every parent the opportunity of intimating to the teachers of the school if he wished his children to have religious instruction. If so, then he thought the machinery of the State should be available for that type of religious instruction which did not advance the particular interest of any particular sect or any particular society. Such was Cowper-Templeism dependent upon the actual defined wish of the parent—[A laugh]—and it was so in spite of the irrelevant laugh of the noble Lord who apparently could conceive no kind of religious teaching which did not grind the axe of some special group of people. He himself said it was right and just that the State machinery should be used for undenominational religious teaching where the parent desired it. They did not think it fair that the machinery should be used as a matter of compulsion where the parent did not indicate that he desired it. If they put real compulsion upon children attending school to have Cowper-Temple religion or compulsory arithmetic they were making it more difficult for the child to receive religious instruction in some other place at that hour if the parents wished it. He wished to facilitate that.

Lord ROBERT CECIL: Why should you care about that?

*Mr. ADKINS said he was grateful for that observation. It showed in language the most brief and least courteous the abyss of ignorance in which the noble Lord lived with regard to this question. He cared about it, and the other members of the Committee who supported undenominational religion wished also to give every facility for denominational teaching elsewhere. By voting for the clause they were voting for making religion as it should be, a voluntary matter. He must cordially support the clause as against the Amendment, and he believed if it were ultimately amended so as to give religious instruction to children whose parents cared about it then they would obtain it for all children whose parents desired it, and the teachers of the school would know as far as it was possible what children were intended to be there and what parents desired the assistance of the teachers in giving religious instruction to the children.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Dr. Macnamara and Mr. George White.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Blackpool and that in the name of the hon. Member for Lincoln would practically lead to a re-discussion of the question they had been discussing this afternoon, with the exception of one small part, and therefore they were out of order.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London), upon a point of order, submitted that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Blackpool† went beyond the purview of the decision of the Committee, the Committee were not precluded from discussing it.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the Committee had practically decided that the operative part of the clause was to stand The operative part of the clause was that the parent of a child attending a public elementary school should not be under any obligation to cause the child to attend at the school house except during the times allotted to secular instruction. That being the case, the class which the hon. Member for Blackpool sought to exempt was already exempted. If he were allowed to discuss his Amendment he would have to do so on the lines that the particular class of parent to whom he alluded should be exempted, while other classes should not be exempted. That would be quite out of order in view of the decision of the Committee. The same observations applied to the other Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Lincoln on the Paper to the clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) said he desired in the few minutes that were left to the Committee for the consideration of this Bill to enter his protest against this clause because it was a cowardly one, inasmuch as it sought to relieve the Committee of the responsibility of saying that religion should go out of the schools of the country and invited the parents to say it for themselves. On a previous occasion the Committee had decided that religion should remain within the school hours, but by the admission by his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education what they were now called upon to vote was that religion should be taken out of school hours. It required no courage on the part of the Government to bring the Committee to such a position as this, but it might imply lack of prudence and foresight on the part of the Government to induce the Committee to stultify its own previous decision. Religion in the school was to be treated worse even than it was treated in the House of Commons. He felt strongly on this question, and he believed that this clause was going to place the supporters of the Bill in an impossible position. He urged them to be honest. He would a hundred times sooner have voted for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Burnley, or the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, because, whatever might be said of those Amendments, they did not put religion as a sort of curtain-raiser before the performance in which everyone was supposed to take an interest. This clause did not keep even the word of promise and it broke it to the hope. It invited the parent to do what the Committee could not do themselves. It might be thought that the people of England would not understand the proceedings of this House, but he thought they would understand unmistakably what the Committee meant by passing a clause of this kind, and the invitation which would thus be written upon the forefront of the Bill. The clause paltered with them in a double sense and menaced their interests.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) said the Government had not succeeded in their attempt to follow some of the worst examples set on the Continent of banishing the name of religion from our schools. They had called upon the Committee to settle the question, but the division which had just taken place would not settle it. Could anything be settled by a majority of sixteen? As long as the Government possessed a majority of hundreds they might hope to settle this question one way or another, but they could not do it with the majority which they had just gained. When the news of this debate was read to-morrow, everybody outside this

†The Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Blackpool was "in Clause 6, page 4, line 9, after the word 'school,' to insert the words 'provided that he is able to satisfy the local education authority that the child is receiving adequate religious instruction elsewhere than at the school.'"

House, at any rate, would agree that the division which had just taken place would not settle the question. Instead of hundreds, the Government had only a majority of sixteen. [Cries of "No, no."] He judged the action and the desire of the Government by the speech of that Member of the Government who was in charge of the Bill. The speech of the Minister for Education this afternoon was as strong a speech in favour of Clause 6 as could be made. It was a strong invitation to the Party spirit of the supporters of the Government. The clause was supported on the whole by the Party of the Government, and if the Government desired to leave it to the free and unfettered decision of the House, why did they ask the Minister in charge of the Bill to deliver the strong and powerful appeal he made? He appealed to the Government to withdraw the clause altogether, and not to allow it to go forth that at this time in the world's history England was about to follow the example of those other countries [Cries of "America"] which were practically abolishing religion and the name of God from their schools. A short time ago the Committee by an overwhelming majority voted that religion should be taught and the name of God heard in our schools. The same issue was now practically before the Committee, and the division which had just taken place showed an extraordinary change. The Amendment had only been defeated by a miserable majority of sixteen in a House of 550 Members, and was the Government going to the country and say, "We have settled this point in the education system for you in a House of 550 Members by a majority of sixteen"? He appealed to the Prime Minister, to the Government, and to the Minister for Education to do what was, after all, the only consistent thing, and to withdraw the clause.

MR. PAUL said he was going to vote against the clause, and he respectfully protested against the speech of the hon. Member for East Clare, because he was grateful to the Government for having allowed hon. Members to vote as they pleased. It could not be honestly said that hon. Gentlemen who voted against the Amendment were voting against the teaching of religion in the schools.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Lord Robert Cecil and Mr. F. E. Smith.

And, it being after eleven of the Clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 10) BILL (BY ORDER.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) said that he wished to move as an Amendment that this Bill be read a second time three months hence. He, and those who agreed with him, felt it their duty to oppose this particular Bill because they believed that that course was in the interest of the Corporation of Manchester and would be also for the advantage of the ship canal. He admitted that the Manchester Corporation at one time was in favour of this Bill, but the Finance Committee of the Corporation had since reported against it. He was glad that a change had taken place in the position of the Corporation of the City of Manchester in consequence of its having been felt that enough consideration had not been given for the damage which might be done to the Manchester Ship Canal by the Bill. Some people might ask what had the Manchester Ship Canal to do with this Bill, but he might point out that when that canal was first projected it was calculated that it would cost about £8,000,000 sterling, but when the work had got on to a considerable extent it was found that another £5,000,000 would be required. That money was not to be found in the open market and the Corporation of Manchester found it by the permission of this House. Another £1,000,000 was by the permission of the House similarly invested, so that altogether the Corporation of Manchester had invested £6,000,000 in the Manchester Ship Canal. The Manchester Corporation considered that the carrying of this Bill would seriously damage their interests, because, as the House was well aware, the whole question of shipping was a very delicate one, and if any port suffered from more inspection than other ports it was sufficient to cause shippers and shipowners to send ships to other ports. The powers given to the port sanitary authority would put Manchester in a different position from that which existed at present in other ports. The corporation had a power of inspection throughout the city, and if a greater power of inspection was granted than prevailed in other ports, it would do great damage to the ship canal. [Cries of "Why?"] If special powers of inspection were given to the port sanitary authority on the quays, it would do great damage to the ship canal. The same powers would not be given in regard to other ports, and the present powers of inspection at Manchester were ample. He did not see why an exceptional course should be taken in regard to Manchester and Liverpool with reference to inspection when their present system was sufficiently rigid to exclude the importation of bad meat from Chicago or anywhere else. Glasgow was not to be subjected to the conditions which were proposed with regard to Liverpool and Manchester, in which places the best possible course was taken to preserve good hygienic conditions. He maintained that Manchester did its duty in the matter of meat inspection, and he thought it would be impracticable to inspect cargoes in the ports and on the docks. It would lead to delay and large claims for demurrage. If any change was to be made it ought to be made in all the ports of the kingdom. It might be said that this was a question of the rich against the poor and that the owners of the ship canal, as long as they got their dividends, did not wish to have inspection in their docks. All he could say, if that was the line of argument, was that it was no great catch to hold canal shares at present, although he was glad to say the prospects of the ordinary shares paying a dividend were improving. Only 10 per cent. of the food stuffs used in Lancashire was introduced by way of the Manchester Ship Canal. Eighty per cent. or 90 per cent. was landed at Liverpool, and if any restriction was to be put in force it should commence at any rate at Liverpool. Therefore if there was to be any reform in this matter they would insist upon a general measure being passed by the Government, in which case they would endeavour to improve it when it came before them. In the meanwhile he hoped all who took an interest in the Manchester Ship Canal and who thought that the canal should obtain a fair share of these shipments from other countries would join with him and support him in the division that would take place almost immediately.

*MR. KELLEY (Manchester, S.W.), in seconding the Motion, said that the Bill would inflict a great injustice upon Manchester. He did not think he would be out of order in moving the rejection of this measure when they had regard to the struggle they had to make the canal, to obtain the money to make it, and the struggles they had had since to encourage its use by shippers. He did not think there was any man who had had more to do with the working classes in connection with this canal and who had induced more men to take up shares in the ship canal than himself. He had a small holding of shares in it, but though a shareholder he was not influenced by that fact to-night. They had had a good many struggles to make the canal a success, and now that they were just beginning to make some headway somebody got the Chicago meat scare fever and no doubt unwittingly were trying to injure them. In confirming this provisional order they would inflict a great injustice on Manchester. They simply asked that the same treatment should be given to Manchester as to other ports of the United Kingdom. They did not quarrel with the idea of a closer inspection, they quite approved it, but they said that if closer inspection were needed it should be applied to the whole of the ports of the Kingdom and not to Manchester alone. He therefore seconded the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. C. E. Schwann.)

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea) said he felt some degree of confidence that the House of Commons would pass the Second Reading of this Bill and would send it upstairs to the proper tribunal, where the questions raised by the two previous speakers would be adequately discussed. Let him give briefly the history of this provisional order, which did not emanate from the Local Government Board, but was conceived in Manchester. It was mothered by Manchester and fifteen other local authorities. It was deposited on the steps of the Local Government Board, and he now asked the House of Commons to send it upstairs, where the infant could be properly examined. The bare facts were these. The Manchester Port Sanitary Authority, of the which Manchester City Corporation was the predominant partner, came for a provisional order, asking that there should be vested in them certain powers and duties of a sanitary authority under the Public Health Acts relating to the inspection of food. The Local Government Board received the letter from the Manchester Port Sanitary Authority on September 27th, 1905, stating that they had had before them the question of unsound food being conveyed within their district by means of ships coming to the Port of Manchester, and that they asked in consequence that the Local Government Board should give them this provisional order. The Local Government Board sent an official down to the district to hold a public inquiry. There was practically no opposition. The Manchester Corporation concurred as would be seen, by the following letter written in October—

> "The Corporation of Manchester understand that an application has been made to the Local Government Board by the Manchester port sanitary authority for powers to seize unsound articles intended for the food of man either on board ship or before they are removed from the docks. The sanitary authority of the Manchester Corporation have had the matter under consideration, and as they are convinced that the proposal is in the public interest they heartily support the application of the Manchester port sanitary authority, and trust that it will receive favourable consideration on the part of the Local Government Board."

The public inquiry was held by an officer from the Local Government Board, and no objection was raised by the City of Manchester. The First Reading of the Bill took place on May 25th, and between then and now nothing had transpired except, perhaps, the Chicago meat scandals; but he ventured to say that nothing that could be deduced therefrom was a reason why additional powers of inspection should not be given. Recently Manchester had put forward the following reason for varying its original request. Since the inquiry the directors of the Manchester Ship Canal said they had overlooked the notice of the public inquiry, and as Liverpool Port Sanitary Authority did not possess powers, ships coming to Manchester would be liable to interference not prevailing at Liverpool. Hence Manchester would be placed at a disadvantage compared with Liverpool in competing for the importation of food products. This opinion, however, was not practically sustained by the facts. Liverpool Town Council, who were the port sanitary authority of Liverpool, did exercise these powers, but not so much in the port as in the city. Last year Liverpool rejected 400 tons of rotten canned meat from the United States. Every day Liverpool was doing its duty under precisely the same powers, duties, and obligations to the public health as Manchester was content to ask for from the Local Government Board, and which he sincerely trusted the House of Commons would see that Manchester had in the passing of this particular Bill. The sixteen authorities that made up the Manchester port sanitary authority said truly that one port sanitary authority on the Manchester Ship Canal could more cheaply, more efficiently, and more impartially inspect the meat at a given place on the Manchester Ship Canal than could fifteen or sixteen sanitary authorities attempting to do the same work here, there, and everywhere. Now this particular power was exercised by the London Port Sanitary Authority,and they were only asking the House of Commons to give to the Manchester Port Sanitary Authority the powers possessed by each of the sixteen constituent authorities that made up the Port Sanitary Authority of Manchester—Manchester with these other bodies took the initiative in demanding these powers, and he saw no reason why the matter should not go forward as originally intended. He did not ask the House to judge as between Manchester Members and himself, but that the proposal should go upstairs to a Committee before which Manchester would have a fairer opportunity of stating its case than it could at that time of the night in a House imperfectly equipped for coming to a proper decision. Might he put it to the Manchester Members that it would seriously damage Manchester as a port and as a sanitary authority if it were assumed, as it might be if this Provisional Order Bill were not carried to-night, that Manchester wanted to be lenient toward foreign tinned meat coming into its port, whilst a general law was enforced by the London, Liverpool, Hull, Grimsby, and other English ports? In this matter he asked for equal rights for all white men, whether they came from Chicago or Great Britain, and he did not see why Chicago or American tinned meat coming via Manchester Ship Canal should be treated any more leniently than live pork from Limerick, or Scottish beef from Scotland, or mutton and beef from Yorkshire, Derbyshire, and elsewhere. It was absolutely necessary to give the Manchester Port Sanitary Authority the power to reject unsound meat. Manchester's original request was a wise one, for it found a difficulty in preventing unsound meat from coming into the Manchester Ship Canal. If Manchester had a rivalry with Liverpool, the best way to meet it was for Liverpool and Manchester to be on equal terms, as this Provisional Order would put them. He asked the House to send the Bill upstairs and enable the people of this country to be protected from the foreign importer of bad meat, and not give him privileges which were not accorded to the home producer.

*MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under-Lyne) said that after the speech of the President of the Local Government Board, the House might think that a representative of Manchester would hardly have the audacity to rise at that time of night, but Manchester Members were not responsible for detaining the House at that hour. The responsibility rested with the President of the Local Government Board for bringing on the measure after eleven o'clock at night when he knew that every representative of Manchester was opposed to the Order. He was a member of the Manchester City Council, which was a corporation, (as all interested in municipal administration well knew), with the interests of the people of Manchester at heart, and in this respect one of the most forward corporations in the country. They had presented to this House an unanimous petition signed by the Lord Mayor, and bearing the seal of the Manchester Corporation. The right hon. Gentleman asked why should they make any difference between Manchester and Liverpool. He would tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he would make the conditions the same in Manchester and Liverpool, every Manchester Member would at once withdraw his opposition. Was that a fair offer? The right hon. Gentleman knew well enough that the conditions would not be the same under this Order. If he had brought in a Bill to prevent canned meat from landing at any British port, he would have found no more loyal supporters than the men who had been returned from Manchester and those associated with that town. It had been said that Manchester had changed its mind. Manchester had a right to change its mind, and no one recognised that better than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. Manchester had changed its mind for the selfsame reason that the right hon. Gentleman had changed his mind on the unemployed question, namely, that it had got facts and information which it had not when it lent its name to the first application. This was a Government measure, and he wanted to know why it should be hurried through the House. A circular sent out by the port sanitary authority was signed by William Huddart, who was recognised as the greatest opponent of amalgamation between Manchester and Salford. Salford had taken Manchester Corporation into court to get an increased rate, and yet the ship canal had been the making of Salford. It was true that the ship canal traffic did not yield a dividend, but it should be remembered that when the trade of Manchester was declining it wanted no protection remedies. It wanted access to the world, and, having built the ship canal at great sacrifice, freights into Manchester had been lowered to the extent of £1,000,000 a year. Manchester only asked for freedom. It did not ask for special treatment, or for freedom to import bad food. [Cries of "Agreed."] Oh, no; they were not agreed. Here were the conditions of sale which existed in Liverpool at the present time. There was a classification of food as "sound" "slack" and "slightly wet." There was also "wastage." What did that classification mean? Everything containing less than two per cent. of waste was "sound"; less than 5 per cent. "seconds"; less than 10 per cent. "thirds." Less than 20 per cent. was "X"; and 50 per cent. "double X." After that they were "wastage." But still "wastage" had a value, and could be bought on the Liverpool market. they in Manchester did not desire that these meats should be unloaded from boats in Manchester; and therefore they were being brought into Manchester by rail. The unfairness of the Provisional Order was to place the port of Manchester in an unfair position as compared with Liverpool. All he asked was that Manchester should compete fairly with other ports.

*MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick) said he did not propose to inflict a speech on the House, but it appeared to him, in the words of the last speaker, that the House was slightly wet. [Cries of "Oh, oh" and "withdraw."] His hon. friends had taken an extraordinary way of reasoning with the House in their appeal for the rejection of this Bill. If he understood the position correctly, the Manchester Corporation practically introduced this Bill themselves but they had suddenly changed their minds. The hon. Member who spoke last had said with truth that they had a perfect right to change their minds, but he wanted to know what occult influence had been at work to induce them to change their mind. Did it come from Chicago? He wished to lay down the general proposition that if the system of inspection was to be imposed on other ports, then it was time that they began with Manchester. He would like to point out to the House—because he was in the native meat trade himself—that there was a more rigid inspection of all native meat than of importations of meat, live or dead, or frozen or chilled, or in tins. He thought that this House should give the same equality of opportunity and protection to the native producers of these isles who paid rent, rates, and taxes, as they did to the foreigner. He therefore supported the Bill, and he hoped the House by an overwhelming majority would defeat the Motion for rejection. There was no reason why this Bill should not go to a Committee upstairs.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) said that he thought that Salford as well as Manchester was entitled to have something to say in this matter. The terminus of the Manchester Ship Canal, and its docks were in Salford, and what they wanted there was cleanly and wholesome food. For that reason the borough which he represented desired that this Bill should be supported by its representatives. The Vice-Chairman of the Health Committee of the Salford Corporation had succeeded in bringing the death-rate down considerably, and one of the means by which he hoped to get it still lower was to get meat coming into the borough inspected.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said that although that evening it seemed to be regarded as an unfortunate thing to say anything in favour of Manchester he proposed to take that course. Before the date of provisional orders private promoters always had a right to withdraw a Bill at any moment, and he did not think that right was affected by the fact that the Local Government Board now promoted provisional orders on behalf of public bodies. Supposing a Corporation were minded to buy the local gas works and then afterwards found they did not want to do so, was their original Bill to be crammed down their throats in the manner in which it was sought to thrust this Bill down the throats of the Manchester Corporation. The Chicago meat scandals had been referred to, but there was a great deal of humbug about them. Men's fingers were dearer than beef, and he believed the alleged scandals were part of a Presidential campaign. But for this Chicago meat scandal the Local Government Board would have yielded to that plea of Manchester. Manchester had always been a supporter of Ireland, and for that if for no other reason he supported the action of the hon. Members from that city.

*MR. HAWORTH (Manchester, S.) said it was unsatisfactory to a loyal supporter of the Government even to appear to be opposed to them. He thought it was hardly worthy of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to bring in the question of Chicago tinned meats, because this matter was in hand before the revelations with regard to Chicago. As to the fact that Manchester changed her mind, that City wanted as good an inspection of food as any other place, but when she found that if this Bill were passed Manchester would be placed in an invidious position in regard to various other ports, she changed her position. If these powers were given to the port sanitary authority the House would be simply duplicating them. If they were duplicated for one city they ought to be duplicated for others. They wanted to confirm and not to oppose this Order, but they also wanted to make it effective. It had been already pointed out that only 10 per cent. of the foodstuffs consumed in the district entered through the port of Manchester and that 90 per cent. came in from the ports of Liverpool, Hull, and Bristol. They had no objection to this measure going through on an equality and then it would be an effective Order; whereas if it went through in its present shape the whole thing would be uneffective.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. EMMOTT, Oldham) said he had listened very carefully to this debate in order to see whether the arguments on both sides would lead him to a conclusion as to whether it was a matter of principle that ought to be settled on a Second Reading or whether this was a Bill that ought to go to a Committee upstairs. His conviction was very strong that it should be sent upstairs. The point made by the hon. and learned Member for North Louth that the President of the Local Government Board had done something unusual in his action with regard to this measure, did not, he thought, apply. He did not think the House was in a position to judge of the merits of this case. In the first place, they had heard of the change of opinion on the part of Manchester. He did not know the reason of that change but that was a matter that could be better investigated in Committee, and was a matter the House was not in a position to discuss. Then they were told that there were sixteen sanitary authorities affected, but that statement was denied by an hon. Member who said there were only three. They also heard of the conditions of Liverpool being equally strict, yet other Members said that Liverpool had an advantage. All these were surely matters which could be dealt with and settled much better upstairs, and therefore he hoped the House would send this Bill upstairs. The matters in dispute were of a character which could be better settled in Committee than in the House.

*MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe) said he opposed this Provisional Order. One hon. Member said he supported the Order for the sake of the poor of Salford, and if he had thought that was more important than anything else he should have supported the hon. Member. But the hon. Gentleman forgot that only one-tenth of the foodstuffs consumed in Lancashire came through the Manchester Ship Canal, and that if this Order were passed it would not prevent foodstuffs coming in via Liverpool. He quite admitted that the Manchester and Salford authorities had made a mistake in making this appeal. But this was a Lancashire question. The Manchester Ship Canal was a Lancashire canal and Lancashire had suffered for it, though he admitted they had also received benefits from it. They desired to see it prosper and they were not going to stand idly by and see restrictions put upon the canal which were not put upon other ports. There was no contesting the fact that the same thing was going on in Stretford, Salford, and Manchester as was going in Bristol, Birkenhead and Liverpool, and it was not fair to press a proposal against the wishes of those who instigated it in the first instance, but who had changed their minds as soon as they ascertained the facts. If this had been an ordinary Bill nothing more would have been heard of it. It would have been dropped. But because it was in the power of the Government they pressed it. Nothing would have been heard of it but for this scare. He objected to its going upstairs. Let the House settle it now. What would be the position if it went upstairs? They would be prejudiced when it came down because they would be told they must support the decision of the Committee. He wanted to impress on the right hon. Gentleman that he quite agreed with him and would do all he could to assist him to protect this country from the importation of bad meat. But he thought the right hon. Gentleman in this case had taken a wrong course and had not gone the right way to effect that purpose. Therefore he hoped he would drop this Provisional Order and bring in a general Bill to deal with all ports alike.

MR. HORRIDGE (Manchester, E.) said the provisions of the Bill ought to be in a general Bill applying to all ports. This Order suggested that Section 116 of the Public Health Act should be applied by the port sanitary authority That section gave to the Corporation power to inspect food which was prepared or exposed for sale. It had nothing to do with cargoes of ships but was intended to deal with food in markets or shops, and by this Provisional Order it was sought to apply the section to cargoes of ships. The section said that anyone exposing unsound food for sale should be liable to a penalty of £20 or to imprisonment for twelve months. Was it seriously intended that the Manchester Ship Canal directors were to be liable to that punishment if any piece of unsound food were landed at the quay? He did not believe the President of the Local Government Board had appreciated that at all. What the right hon. Gentleman ought to do was to bring in a Bill to deal with the power of inspection at all ports instead of applying a section of an Act, intended to be applied to shops and markets, to the great Manchester Ship Canal. Manchester at the present moment was in exactly the same position as Liverpool as a port sanitary authority, and the right hon. Gentleman must know that this Order would not put Manchester in the same position as Liverpool. It was hard enought now to get shipowners to bring their cargoes up to Manchester. If the right hon. Gentleman put this handicap upon the trade of Manchester by saying there should be this double inspection and this worrying of the shipowners when the Corporation had already its meat inspectors, it would drive shipowners away from Manchester altogether. It was not only an unfair proposal but it was stupid and unworkable. It was not a question to send to a Committee upstairs, but for this House to deal with in a general measure. He did not want it to be said that the Members for Manchester or the Corporation shrank from any inspection of food; but this was an improper inspection and put an unfair handicap upon Manchester. The Government ought to deal in a Bill with an important question such as that raised about canned meat.

INTERMEDIATE BOARD (RULES).

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.) moved an Address to His Majesty praying that the Rules of the Intermediate Board for the year 1907 be disapproved of, and that other Rules be substituted in conformity with the Resolution of the House on 21st May last. † He said this was an exceedingly important Motion which deserved the serious attention of hon. Members who had any regard for the powers of this House. It would be remembered that on 21st May last a Resolution was carried unanimously demanding that the Intermediate Board of Ireland should alter the rules which they first published. The Motion which was then carried had been on paper for a week. The Board refused, however, to adopt the changes which he then suggested, namely, that better facilities should be given for the teaching of the Irish language in the Intermediate Board's programme. Their refusal to grant this demand was based upon the grounds that they were of opinion that for intermediate students the study of French and German was of far greater educational advantage and practical value. That was the reason they then urged for not accepting the suggestions. Some time afterwards they were again asked whether they had decided to adopt the resolution of the House, and the second excuse they made was that they were unable to make the changes because if they did the Rules could not be laid on the Table forty days before the House rose, and consequently there would be no intermediate programme and nothing for the students to go on with. Neither of these excuses was sincere. The only reason why the Board had not done what the House had asked them to do was that they felt that the Irish language was getting better placed in the programme through the action of the House than they were determined it should be. He would ask the Chief Secretary to give them some assurance that they were going to obey the decision of the House. The Board had declared that they were not going to be intimidated by the Gaelic League and that was the kernel of their refusal to adopt the suggestions contained in the Resolution. He would like to ask whether there was any precedent for the condition of affairs in which they found themselves tonight. By the unanimous resolution of this House certain suggestions were made, and without any apology whatsoever the Intermediate Board, one of the forty by which this country governed Ireland, said "No, we spurn, we reject with contempt the unanimous vote of the House of Commons." If the House now voted against the Address to His Majesty it would stultify itself, and say it was powerless when one of these Irish boards came in opposition to it. The Chief Secretary, when the Resolution of 21st May was discussed, said he was hopeful that there would be no difficulty in carrying out the changes which were then suggested. He had sent to the right hon. Gentleman a few circulars showing what the Board did on previous occasions. In September, 1905, when the House was not sitting, and when the school year had begun the Intermediate Board changed their programme. On May 21st when his Motion was brought forward, the Board refused to adopt alterations which were not nearly so radical or so difficult as had been proposed to be brought into operation in the previous October. He maintained that this was one of the old boards, one of the remnants of the old garrison which had destroyed their country and deprived their children of education, which education it still refused to give when it was afraid its days were numbered.

† See (4) Debates, clvii., 1072.

MR. JOHN REDMOND Waterford), in seconding the Motion, said that he rose for the purpose of pressing on the House of Commons the extraordinary character of this Board. Certain boards in Ireland did their work very well, because they were responsible to this House through Ministers who had to answer for their action; but this was a very different kind of board. Not only was it not responsible to the public opinion of Ireland or England, or even this House, but it was absolutely independent, and there was no means of bringing it to book, unless the Chief Secretary were to dismiss it altogether or unless this House were to refuse funds to carry on education in Ireland. Was not that an extraordinary illustration of the system by which the Government of Ireland was carried on? It would not be tolerated in any other country in the world. For instance, what happened the other day? Under the Statute the rules for carrying on intermediate education in Ireland had to be laid on the Table of the House of Commons for forty days, in order that the House might choose to refuse or sanction those rules. The House of Commons decided that those rules should be altered. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary whether it was true that this Board had passed a resolution immediately after the Resolution adopted by the House of Commons absolutely refusing to carry out the directions of this House? He thought the House of Commons was entitled to ask the Chief Secretary, who was not responsible in this matter, whether it was a fact that this Board had decided to reject the decision of the House of Commons and despised it? Further, he thought the minutes of the Board should be published, together with the names of the gentlemen who overthrew the decision of the House of Commons. The House of Commons was entitled to a frank answer on this matter. He believed that the Board had taken up the attitude that it was too late to carry out the Resolution of the House of Commons in time for the examinations for next year. He had received a communication from Monsignor Molloy, which he was empowered to quote, that that right rev. gentleman personally approved of the changes which the House of Commons had made, and that, from his long experience in the working of the Board, in his judgment there would have been no difficulty, with the time at their disposal, in carrying out the changes authorised by the Resolution of the House of Commons. He acknowledged that the Chief Secretary's task in Ireland was difficult; but the only chance the right hon. Gentleman had of successful administration was not to permit himself to be bullied by these boards; and if they insisted on ignoring the Resolution passed by the House of Commons he should instantly dismiss them and appoint another body in their place. The effect of that would not only be beneficial on the Intermediate Education Board, but on all the other boards in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Rules of the Intermediate Board for the year 1907, sealed the 19th day of June, be disapproved of."—(Mr. Thomas O'Donnell.)

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL (Dublin University) said that at the outset he begged to say that he entirely sympathised with and supported the strong appeal made by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford to the Chief Secretary that the minutes of the Intermediate Education Board should be made public. He would, however, remind the House as to how this matter had arrived at its present stage. The Board was the creation of this House. It consisted of twelve members, including the present Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Father Finlay and Monsignor Molloy; and when the rules came before the House on May 23rd last, the Chief Secretary who threw them over forgot that they had received the approval and signature of the Lord-Lieutenant, who was the chief of the Irish Government. The Chief Secretary voted in favour of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kerry on May 23rd which was an unprecedented action on the part of the Chief Secretary. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion made a great mistake in throwing over with a light heart the rules which had been ratified by the Lord-Lieutenant. The hon. Member for Waterford said the House of Commons decided by a certain vote a certain thing, and that the Board had defied the action of the House, and from the information he had received the Board had passed a resolution not to comply with the decision of the House. He had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say on June 20th† that the Board had not refused to carry out the decision of the House of Commons.

Mr. BRYCE said that was perfectly true.

Mr. JAMES CAMPBELL was ready to accept the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, but he thought in justice to the Board the right hon. Gentleman ought to lay the resolution of the Board on the Table of the House.

Mr. BRYCE: I never refused. What I said was that there was a correspondence going on, and that, at that time, I could not do so.

Mr. JAMES CAMPBELL said the Board wished the minutes to be submitted, and the time was surely come when the Chief Secretary should do what was asked by everyone interested. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had got himself into a difficult position in this matter, but the exact position should be known to Members of that House. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Kerry was brought up and passed by this House in the ignorance of most of the Members that these rules had already received the consent of the Lord-Lieutenant and of the Irish Executive. He could only agree and sympathise with the demand that had been made on the right. hon. Gentleman.

Mr. BRYCE said he was sorry that he would have to detain the House rather longer than he intended. The matter was very simple, but so much extraneous matter had been introduced, particularly by the hon. Member for the Dublin University, that he was obliged to give the House the facts of the case. This House passed a Resolution on the May 21st last expressing dissent from many points in these rules. He did not dissent from them all. He expressed an opinion on one of them. The Motion was made by the hon. Member for West Kerry, and he then gave the House all the details that the Board had given to him, and no statement could be more inaccurate than the statement just made by the hon. Member for the Dublin University when he said that he (Mr. Bryce) had not defended the Board by giving this statement to the House. The rules had received the formal sanction of the Board itself. It was a purely formal sanction, and was not accompanied by any suggestion as to the facts that influenced its decision in changing the rules. There was nothing to call the attention to the Lord-Lieutenant to the fact that this was likely to become the subject of controversy. There had been cases where similar sanction had been given by a department to rules and schemes where the Government of the day after the rules had been brought up had refused to alter them. Those were English precedents which amply justified him in the action he took when he made his statement to the House. On this matter he was careful to guard himself from answering the question as to what the Board had done, and merely stated the case which was put to him by the Board that they were not then declining to comply with the Resolution of the House. He did that in order to give them an opportunity to retreat from what he held to be an untenable position. He said it was impossible to make a full statement, because correspondence was passing between the Government and the Board and that it would be impossible to quote letters or give the effect of the communications until the whole of the letters were given and the whole matter was put before the House. Everything he said was literally and actually true, and he conceived it would be an injury to the Board to go beyond what he said. He had no objection to produce the correspondence, but the minutes of the Board were not under his control.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Board for them?

MR. BRYCE said certainly. If the Board chose to send in their minutes he had no objection to produce them. It was, however, an unusual course, and he hoped it would not be taken as a precedent. He had no objection to ask the Board for the minutes, but he would not press for them. As to the singular system under which the Board administered education, he might say it was not the fault of the Board but of legislation in this House. As the matter stood at present it was inevitable that the House should refuse the Motion of the hon. Member, but that was not due to the merits of the rules but to the position in which they found themselves. He had no power whatever over this Board.

MR. FIELD: Why not evict them?

MR. BRYCE: And this was purely a matter of time. On May 21st the House disapproved of these rules and the effect of the disapproval was not, he thought, what hon. Members opposite intended. Its effect was to extinguish them.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL: Was not that all the House could do?

MR. BRYCE: The Government advised the Intermediate Board that the effect of the Resolution was to extinguish the rules altogether. The Board declined to alter its rules in any way, but when the effect of the Resolution was intimated to them the Board reconsidered their position and proceeded to consider two alternatives. One was to formulate a new set of Rules in accordance with the Resolution of the House. That course they appeared to have dismissed because of the lack of time at their disposal. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford said that he was told by a member of the Board that it could be easily done. That, at any rate, was not a view in which the Board as a whole could concur. He certainly thought the question was more complicated than the hon. and learned Member was disposed to believe, and that there were real difficulties in making a new scheme which, while affording a satisfactory plan for intermediate education, would comply with the decision of this House. These difficulties, however, he hoped might be surmounted. The Board arrived at the conclusion that they could not amend their rules in the time allowed, and they came to the further conclusion that the only course possible for them was to submit the old rules framed in 1905, and which had been in operation during the present year. They said that after all those rules had been approved by the House, and therefore at any rate there could be no great objection to them That course accordingly was taken and was communicated to the Lord Lieutenant, who, in giving his sanction, of course expressed no opinions whatever as to the intrinsic merits of these rules, and he was perfectly free for the future as to any action that might be taken. He would tell the House exactly how the matter stood. It was necessary for the purpose of Intermediate Examinations that there should be rules which it was certain would be in force by the beginning of August. That was the latest time at which these schools could begin to prepare for the examinations of 1907. It was also necessary that the rules should lie for forty days upon the Table of this House. In other words, the rules had to be submitted by the end of June if they were to be in force by the month of August; otherwise the whole machinery of intermediate education would come to a dead stop. Under these circumstances there was no course open to the Lord-Lieutenant but to accept the rules. The matter would have to come up again and the House would have ample opportunity of considering the whole matter, which was not prejudiced in any way by the action which they were asked to take to-night. In the interests of the teachers and pupils the hon. Member would be very ill advised if he stopped the machinery and deprived them of their fees and opportunities.

MR. DILLON said the Intermediate Education Board of Ireland, who were appointed by the British Government, had set the Minister of the Government at defiance. After delaying the matter for five weeks, the Board took a course which absolutely defied the will of the House of Commons, and deliberately abstained from putting forward the old rules until it was too late for the House of Commons to alter them. They held a sword over the heads of Members of this House by threatening to paralyse the whole system of intermediate education in Ireland if they dared to interfere. It might be imagined from the remarks of the Chief Secretary that the Board had yielded in some way to the House of Commons. They had deliberately delayed the matter until it was too late to make any alterations in either the new or the old rules, and then they put forward the old rules which were far worse than those to which objection was taken in certain particulars by the House on the last occasion. That was the way in which this intelligent Irish Board proposed to carry out the will of the House of Commons! The right hon. Gentleman was surprised that the matter should have got into the Irish newspapers. Within five days after the House of Commons passed the Resolution there appeared in the Irish Times of Dublin a most insolent article, written by one of the members of the Board, in which the whole of the information which the right hon. Gentleman had been refusing to give the House of Commons was disclosed, accompanied by every form of insult, in which the right hon. Gentleman was told that he would soon find out that he had tackled a body which would not tolerate his dictation or that of the House of Commons. The Board had triumphed so far and had persisted in their defiance. They had performed a flank movement, defeated the Chief Secretary, and made fools of the House of Commons at whom they were now laughing. Their threat that unless the House of Commons swallowed the rules they would paralyse the whole intermediate education of Ireland was simply a piece of bluff, and he trusted the House would not sit down tamely under it. Last year, when the House of Commons had adjourned, there were three alterations at least as important as those made on the rules, and they were never tabled at all. Nevertheless the whole system of examinations was carried on last winter. By voting for the Resolution they would not be voting against the Chief Secretary in any way, but would be vindicating the right hon. Gentleman against the grossest piece of insolence on the part of this Board.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said he was present when the Amendments were made, and he had doubts in his mind at the time as to whether the right hon. Gentleman ought not to have asked for time to consider the matter. But now that the thing was done he would be no party to allowing this Board to dictate to the House. He knew the Board, and if the House took this matter lying down it would have to take a great deal more. If his hon. friends went to a division he should certainly vote against the Board.

MR. GORDON (Londonderry, S.) said it was hardly reasonable that there should be a deliberate attack made upon a highly honourable body of men who were appointed to do a particular work. They were men of the highest standing and character. The Chief Secretary himself had admitted that this matter was not one which could be dealt with at once, but that there were great difficulties in the way. Before accepting any alterations in the rules, the right hon. Gentleman would have been wise to have ascertained whether it was possible to give effect to the alterations or not. The Board had done the only thing that was open to them, and that was to take up the rules which had been approved by the Lord-Lieutenant. These were the rules which were to be in operation for next year, and it would be most unfortunate, no matter who had blundered when the Resolution of 21st May was passed, if they were to be altered now. The Motion should be negatived in order that the work of the Intermediate Board should not be brought to a stand still.

MR. MORTON (Sutherlandshire) said it could not be doubted that the Intermediate Board had delayed dealing with the suggestions until it could be pleaded that there was not the necessary time to include them in the programme for this year. After the disclosures which had been made to-night it appeared that what was called government in Ireland, even in the hands of a Liberal Government, was a travesty of good government. He was not surprised that the representatives of Ireland should ask for Home Rule.

MR. T. M. HEALY said an attempt had been made to throw blame on the Chief Secretary. Whoever was to blame, it was not the right hon. Gentleman. If there was blame in the matter it must be shared by every Irish Member. What interest had the right hon. Gentleman in getting Liberal Members to vote for maintaining these rules? There were a number of friendly Englishmen below the Gangway who would be only too happy to join the Irish Members in expressing their detestation on this matter. Let the right hon. Gentleman remember that those gentlemen in Dublin Castle had no more regard for him than they had for the door porter outside. Their one idea would be all through the right hon. Gentleman's regimé at every step he took to trip him up, to thwart him, and to baffle him. By the strong pressure which he was at present putting on his supporters he was giving these men a triumph over the Irish representatives, and, what was more, a triumph over himself. He fully appreciated the point that if the rules were disapproved of again these men would take the bit between their teeth and refuse any rules by which money could be taken. They would thereby inflict a grievous wrong on every school and college in Ireland, and their names would stink in the nostrils of the people. Was not that a consummation which the right hon. Gentleman desired as strongly as the Irish Members? A better lesson could not be taught to young Irishmen as to the way in which their country was governed than to show them, when they had been grinding up for examinations for twelve months, that they would be deprived of their just reward by the action of this Board. He asked that the Government should in this matter leave the responsibility with the Irish Members. They would take the responsibility.

MR. DODD (Tyrone, N.) said that if the House passed the Motion as it stood they would merely be repeating the declaration which they made on May 21st. The ruling by which the Motion had had to be put in its present form seemed to suggest that any alterations in the rules were not competent. The Chief Secretary, in asking the House not to pass this Motion, expressed the hope that alterations might be made in the rules. If alterations could not competently be made, he should like to know from the Chief Secretary how he suggested that alterations might be made. The House of Commons presumably had power over these rules, or else they would not be laid on the Table.

MR. BRYCE said that if those rules were included in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kerry no pupils would have been able to get their exhibitions this year. [NATIONALIST cries of "No."] He had been instructed that that was so. He could assure his hon. friend that the Lord-Lieutenant had power to deal with any rules sent up to him by the Intermediate Education Board, that they would be carefully considered, and that every attempt would be made to comply with the Resolution of the House of Commons.

MR. DODD said that the eminent judges and distinguished men who were on the Intermediate Board insisted on obedience to their orders and they ought to have complied with the wishes of the House of Commons.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) believed the Chief Secretary was mistaken. The Board had time enough to deal with the matter. The Irish Members who had children in the schools would take the responsibility, if this Motion were acceded to, and he hoped the House would teach the Board a much-needed lesson.

Mr. Dodd.

MR. DILLON again appealed to the Chief Secretary to leave this matter to the House of Commons.

MR. HELME said there had evidently been a misunderstanding, and he moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. T. M. HEALY suggested that the Motion for the adjournment had been inspired by the Government Whips, and protested against the matter being decided by a fresh House when the Members for Ireland who had already spoken were effectually silenced.

MR. HELME said his action was entirely spontaneous.

MR. T. M. HEALY accepted the hon. Member's statement, but suggested that the Motion should be withdrawn.

MR. DILLON also hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion in view of the powerful argument brought forward by the hon. Member for North Louth that hon. Members who had presented their case to the House against the Board could not speak again. But for that argument he should have been in favour of an adjournment.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL urged that the House was not in a position to decide the case, although that was not the fault of the Irish Members, because they had asked to have the correspondence and papers laid upon the Table. In justice to the Board, however, he must say that he did not think the House was in a position to act.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not hesitate to take strong steps with this Board, which had insulted the House of Commons and the Irish Members for the last twenty years.

MR. W. REDMOND said that if they went to a division it would not be against the Chief Secretary, because the Irish Members were in sympathy with him. The Board had, however, offered no answer to the charge made against them.

MR. BRYCE said the responsibility of carrying out the system of education was upon the Executive Government [NATIONALIST cries of "We ought to be the Executive Government."] Perhaps hon. Gentlemen ought to be, but at present the responsibility of keeping the educational machinery going was on the Irish Executive. He was obliged to make this a matter of Government and executive duty. [NATIONALIST cries of "The same old thing]. He asked hon. Members not to support him or to support this Board, but to do their duty by the teachers and pupils in Irish schools, who ought not to be deprived of their privileges.

Motion for the adjournment of the debate, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.), criticising the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, said he was a disappointed man. He advised the Chief Secretary to stand to his guns and he would then overcome the bitter opposition of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who was animated by personal motives.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said it was not the first time he had been attacked by the hon. Member in this way. Was the hon. Member in order in imputing personal motives to him ?

MR. SPEAKER said he understood the hon. Gentleman to say that the hon. Member was not actuated by personal motives.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL repeated that the hon. Member had accused him of being actuated by personal motives.

MR. T. L. CORBETT said he was bound to admit that he had said that the hon. Member for South Tyrone might possibly have been actuated by personal motives.

*MR. SPEAKER : If the hon. Member said that, it was certainly disorderly.

MR. T. L. CORBETT : Then I withdraw it.

GROUND GAME BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BURGHCLERE: My Lords, the measure which I venture to ask your Lordships to read a second time this afternoon is a small one, but with a somewhat ominous title—a title which will remind those of your Lordships who are unfortunately old enough to remember the difficulties of a quarter of a century ago of the considerable amount of opposition that was aroused to the Ground Game Act of 1880, which was brought in by the late Sir William Harcourt and my noble and learned friend Lord James of Hereford.

The purport of this Bill may, I think, be summed up briefly, but accurately, in a single sentence. It is to extend to the sheep farmers of the Highlands the privilege which every other tenant farmer in Great Britain has enjoyed for many years past—the right of trapping and snaring ground game all the year round. As a matter of fact, this particular right was given to the tenant farmers of Scotland in the Bill of 1880 as it was originally introduced into the House of Commons, for that Bill, as Sir William Harcourt said on the First Reading, was brought in to establish the principle that the right to destroy animals which preyed upon the crops of the farmer should be inseparably incident to the occupation of the soil.

But in the course of the discussions in another place, Mr. Duff, whom some of your Lordships will remember, raised opposition to this privilege being extended to the grouse moors of Scotland. He stated that if moorland was included it would practically do away with sheep farms, and that all the farmers of Scotland would turn their land into deer forests. Mr. Duff took a too pessimistic view of the matter, but Sir William Harcourt seemed to be convinced by his arguments, or, at any rate, he was convinced of the difficulty of piloting so controversial a measure through the House of Commons, and he introduced an Amendment in the Committee stage, which Amendment this measure is designed to delete. The Amendment is in sub-section (3) of Section 1 of the Ground Game Act of 1880. That subsection practically takes away from the occupiers of moorland the right given to every other occupant of agricultural tenancies in Great Britain—namely, the right to trap and snare ground game all the year round.

During the past five or six years this question has been a somewhat burning one among the tenant farmers of Scotland. Sheep farmers allege for various reasons that this sub-section (3), which, as I have shown, is in itself an exception to the principle of the Act, and takes away a right from the tenant farmers in the Highlands only, places them in an exceptional and invidious position, and they have agitated to have it repealed. I would ask your Lordships to remember that the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, which, as noble Lords opposite know, is by no means a partisan body, have on two occasions—at Edinburgh in 1903 and at Perth in 1905—passed unanimously a resolution advocating the principle of the measure which I now ask your Lordships to read a second time. On those occasions two ex-Presidents of the Board of Agriculture were present—at the first, my noble friend, Lord Onslow, and at the second, my right hon. friend Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes; and I gather from the reports of their speeches that these two ex-Ministers for Agriculture looked with a favourable eye on the Resolution unanimously passed in their presence.

Perhaps I should state the principal reasons which were put forward at the meetings in question why the Highland farmers wished this Bill to be brought in. In the first place, they point out that as their right to snare and trap ground game was confined to the period from December 11th to April 1st, the climatic condition of the north of Scotland rendered it somewhat difficult for them to obtain the full advantage of that privilege. As your Lordships know, the higher ground in Scotland is very often covered with snow during a considerable period of the time I have mentioned, and it is impossible for them, during that period, to trap and snare rabbits. The second reason put forward is this, that owing to the custom, which your Lordships know is prevalent in Scotland, of moving sheep early in August to the higher ground, rabbits come in at that time and eat a good deal of the winter feed. The sheep, moreover, trample out the rabbit runs, and render it almost impossible for farmers to fix their snares to catch rabbits. Another reason put forward is that the tenants are unable to get a sufficient supply of rabbits which by sale might in some way or other compensate them for the winter keep which had been eaten.

I do not say that these are the only reasons which can be given, but they were the reasons put forward by the tenant farmers, and which the Chamber of Agriculture endorsed by a unanimous vote. Anybody who has talked with tenant farmers in the Highlands on this subject will know perfectly well that they are just as much impressed as anybody with the value of grouse moors, which they recognise as generally beneficial to the interests of the country; and I am certain that if in the discussions of this Bill any one on behalf of the landlords of Scotland points out that there is anything in the measure detrimental to the preservation of grouse, or in any way injurious to the interests of landlords, the promoters of the Bill and the tenant farmers of Scotland will regard any such suggestion in the most reasonable spirit, so long as it does not directly interfere with the principle of the measure.

Speaking as one who has had considerable experience of grouse moors, I do not believe this Bill would do any harm at all, because the trapping would invariably take place on the fringe of the moor, where birds do not nest in any quantity, for the reason that that part of the moor is constantly being disturbed as it is contiguous to the inhabited farms. I would also point out that in Clause 3 of this Bill there is a provision by which tenants and landlords, should any special circumstances occur to render it necessary that such a step should be taken, can make an agreement for joint exercise. I do not know that it is necessary for me to explain the Bill at any greater length; it is a very short Bill, and it explains itself. Clause 2, as I have said, repeals sub-section (3) of Section 1 of the Ground Game Act of 1880, and enables the occupier of moorland and unenclosed land to kill ground game at any period of the year.

As your Lordships know, in the Ground Game Act no tenant is allowed to make an agreement or contract himself out of the provisions of that Act, but by Clause 3 of this Bill it is permitted that landlords and tenants may make agreements, so long as the agreements they arrive at are to their joint benefit. What that means is this, that if a landlord thought it would be better for his own gamekeeper to destroy the rabbits on the moor, he might come to an agreement with his tenant by giving that tenant a certain proportion of the rabbits that were killed to compensate him for the arrangement. By this it will be seen that Clause 3 is by no means a useless measure. I would remind the House that when the Act of 1880 was first brought in there were some gloomy prophets who said that its introduction would have an injurious effect on the game preservation of Great Britain, but I think your Lordships will acknowledge that, instead of its having had an injurious effect, there never was a time when there was a greater preservation of game than now. Those of your Lordships who were in political life before that time must remember the agitation for doing away with the game laws altogether. Since the passing of the Act of 1880, however, there has been no agitation against the game laws, and the state of preservation of game at the present moment is considerably better than it was before that much contested Act came into operation. For these reasons I venture to commend this small measure to your Lordships' consideration. I do not think it can possibly do any harm to the interests of grouse moors and shooting tenants, but it will remove a real and legitimate grievance of which the Highland farmers have, in my opinion, every reason to complain.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2ª."—(Lord Burghclere.)

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW: My Lords, my noble friend has referred to me as being one of those representing the Department over which at one time he presided who have attended the meetings of the Central Chamber of Agriculture in Scotland. That was an annual event always attended by the President of the Board of Agriculture, and which I used to dub by the title of "the annual heckle." We were always asked a number of questions as to what were the intentions of the Government, and amongst others I was asked whether it was possible for the late Government to bring in a measure similar to this one. I took the precaution of writing round to a large number of my friends, many of them Members of your Lordships' House and large owners of property in the Highlands of Scotland, to ask whether a measure of this kind would meet with their approval. I am bound to say that in the great majority of cases, the replies which I received were entirely in favour of some modification of the existing law, which it was generally felt worked hardly on the tenants of moorlands in Scotland.

But the proposal put before me when I was President of the Board of Agriculture differed in some respects from the one which the noble Lord has introduced tonight. The proposal was that ground game—hares and rabbits—should be destroyed by the tenant, not all the year round, but from October 1st, instead of from December 10th. I am not sure whether it will not be worth while, when your Lordships go into Committee on this Bill, to give consideration to the question whether the power to destroy rabbits during the grouse nesting season is absolutely necessary. I know that when the Ground Game Act was passed, that was one of the very strong reasons why the existing exemption in respect of moorlands was inserted, so that it might not interfere with the grouse at the time they were nesting. I venture to submit for the consideration of my noble friend, whether some alteration of that kind might not with advantage be introduced; but, so far as the general principle of the Bill is concerned, I believe that no right-thinking landlord in Scotland would object to some extention of the conditions under which tenants of moorlands may destroy rabbits. I, therefore, offer no objection to the Second Reading of the Bill.

LORD SALTOUN: My Lords, I do not think that there can be any real harm in tenants having the right to kill rabbits all the year round, but what I do fear is that, whether intentionally or unintentionally, the men they employ may trap or snare birds. During the season when birds are nesting and breeding they are very tame; they move about the runs and are very easily trapped and snared. I think some provision ought to be made for the protection of birds during the nesting season. If my noble friend who has brought in this Bill would accede to that request I would be quite satisfied with the Bill. What I propose—and I will be frank—is to move an Amendment in Committee to make the season begin on September 1st. I hope my noble friend will induce the promoters of the Bill to accept that Amendment, in which event I shall have no objection to the Bill, which would do no harm whatever.

*LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: My Lords, this is not a Bill which applies solely to Scotland. It applies generally to the United Kingdom. It has, however, a special application to Scotland, and has therefore had the earnest consideration of Mr. Sinclair (the Secretary for Scotland). Your Lordships have heard how the restrictions of the snaring of hares and rabbits came to be introduced into the Ground Game Act, 1880, and I should like to call attention to a phrase that was used by the late Sir William Harcourt when he introduced this Amendment. He said that the Amendment was consistent with the principle which he had over and over again stated—namely, that where he could accomplish the object of protecting crops without injuring sport he would do so. He said he had good reason to believe that three-and-a-half months was a sufficient period for farmers on moorlands and unenclosed land to keep down the ground game, and he was, therefore, content that the limitation should be introduced into the Bill.

The attitude of His Majesty's Government in this matter is precisely the same to-day as that taken up by Sir William Harcourt twenty-six years ago. Their desire is to protect agriculture and not to injure sport, and as it has been found in practice that the period allowed under the Act of 1880 is not sufficient, His Majesty's Government will have no objection to the Second Reading of this Bill. They would like, however, to point out to the noble Lord who has introduced it that it might perhaps be desirable in Committee to consider whether the period might not be slightly restricted. This Bill in the other House had the names of two Conservative Members upon it—Lord Dalrymple and Mr. Lane Fox. I think your Lordships will allow that those are two names with a good sporting ring about them. The Bill passed through the other House without Amendment and I believe without discussion, and I hope your Lordships will see your way to give it a Second Reading.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I do not think that any of my noble friends who sit near me are likely to take exception to this Bill. It seems to me, if I may be allowed to say so, a very reasonable measure. It may be desirable in Committee to introduce certain changes in detail, but I will not enter into the consideration of those at present. The Bill as it stands seems to me to be one which, as the noble mover told us, is not calculated to do any material injury to sporting rights in unenclosed places; but I confess I support it on a somewhat broader ground—I mean on the ground that it is not desirable that during nearly nine months of the year occupiers of land in any part of the country should be absolutely prevented from protecting themselves against the ravages of mischievous and destructive animals. I am the more inclined to regard the Bill favourably because I observe that it contains two important provisions which to some extent qualify its effects. Under one of them the use of fire-arms, which for a purpose of this kind are clearly unnecessary, is not permitted, and, under the other, leave is given to the owners and occupiers of these holdings to make and enforce agreements for the exercise for their joint benefit of the right to kill and take ground game. I welcome that admission that questions of this kind can be best dealt with by the joint efforts of the two parties interested in the land of this country, and I for one shall therefore raise no objection to the passing of the Bill.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My Lords, although the course of the debate renders it unnecessary for any words from me, perhaps your Lordships will not think it unnatural that I should like to say something at this stage. The noble Lord in charge of the Bill stated that the Act of 1880 was jointly introduced by the late Sir William Harcourt and myself. In one sense that is true, but it is not an entirely accurate description of what took place. The credit for that Bill was due to Sir William Harcourt. I, as law officer, rendered him all the assistance I could, but it was he who designed the Bill and carried it through the House of Commons. Sir William Harcourt took charge of the negotiations with every possible interest that could be affected, and the skill with which he managed those negotiations can well be understood by every one who knew him.

We were in a strange position then. There were very great fears that the Bill would irritate more than it would soothe. The interests opposed to the landlords were then in a state of great anger. The Bill, however, passed, and those anticipations have been proved to be entirely unfounded. If the Act of 1880 had not been passed, what would have been the state of our game laws now? Probably there would now be no protection for game. The Act has by its justice produced a state of protection for game, and has also got rid of that unhappy feeling which in 1880 existed between the owner of the land and his occupying tenant.

What is the evil that the tenant now complains of? He says that you give him only three months' protection at a time of the year when he cannot take full advantage of it. The three months are of no use to him comparatively. He is shut out during nine months of the year from taking ground game. If we think that there is any hardship on the landlord, that can be dealt with in Committee; but my present view is that we shall not do sufficient to redress the present wrongs if we do not pass the Bill as it is. There will be no more facilities given by this Bill to the tenant to poach the landlord's grouse than exist at present. As tenant he is already on the gronnd. The only practical question to be considered is whether there shall be any alteration in the period of time in the Bill during which ground game may be killed, but I think if you reduce the time mentioned in the Bill it will not give satisfaction to the farmers. There is a desire to do justice to both parties, and I am sure that a satisfactory measure will result from the consideration of this Bill in Committee.

On question, Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE CONGO FREE STATE.

*LORD REAY rose to call attention to the recent Decrees issued by the Government of the Independent State of the Congo, and the correspondence respecting its administration: Africa, No. 1. (1906.)

The noble Lord said: My Lords, in the first place I wish to call your attention to a Circular Despatch of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne), dated August 8th, 1903, which gives a very clear statement with regard to the Congo situation. Lord Lansdowne states in the Despatch that—

> "The sentiments which undoubtedly animated the founders of the Congo State and the representatives of the Powers at Berlin were such as to deserve the cordial sysmpathy of the British Government, who have been loath to believe either that the beneficent intentions with which the Congo State was constituted, and of which it gave so solemn a pledge at Berlin, have in any way been abandoned, or that every effort has not been made to realise them. But the fact remains that there is a feeling of grave suspicion, widely prevalent among the people of this country, in regard to the condition of affairs in the Congo State, and there is a deep conviction that the many charges brought against the State's administration must be founded on a basis of truth. In these circumstances, His Majesty's Government are of opinion that it is incumbent upon the Powers parties to the Berlin Act to confer together and to consider whether the obligations undertaken by the Congo State in regard to the natives have been fulfilled; and, if not, whether the Signatory Powers are not bound to make such representations as may secure the due observance of the provisions contained in the Act."

The next important document in connection with affairs in the Congo was a very able Report by one of His Majesty's Consuls, Mr. Casement, dated December 11th, 1903. It was probably that document and the despatch of the noble Marquess which led the Government of the Congo to appoint a Commission of Inquiry in July, 1904. The next important document is the Report of the Commission of Inquiry, which was issued on October 30th, 1905. Immediately after that Report had been issued, the Congo Government appointed another Commission to examine the Report of the Commission of Inquiry.

The evidence received by the Commission of Inquiry, and the Report of the second Commission have not been published. The reasons given for the refusal to publish these documents are not convincing, and it is certainly to be regretted. But we are told that the conclusions of the second Commission were "in general harmony" with those of the first Commission. That Report may, therefore, be considered to have an authoritative character. There can be no doubt that the Berlin Act gives to His Majesty's Government, as one of the parties to that Act, the right to claim that the obligations undertaken by the Congo State should be fulfilled. I admit that interference with the internal affairs of a foreign State should be sparingly exercised, but from the Report of Consul Casement, and the Report of the Commission of Inquiry, it is quite clear that exceptional circumstances fully justified the remonstrances of His Majesty's Government, which have been endorsed by public opinion in this country.

The next important document is one which appeared on June 3rd—a Report to the Sovereign of the Congo State, by the three Secretaries, Mr. de Cuvelier, Mr. Droogmans and Mr. Liebrechts. That Report is accompanied by a series of extremely important Decrees. Everything depends on the spirit in which these Decrees will be carried out by the officials of the Congo State. Great difficulties have been experienced in the organisation of the Civil Service of the Congo State, and we have a right to expect that continuous efforts will be made to improve the status of officials, who have a very difficult task to perform in such a large territory. With regard to the financial condition of the Congo State, we have not sufficient data to form an adequate judgment. Greater publicity in this respect similar to that which obtains with the accounts in our Colonies would be to the advantage of the Congo State, and would disarm legitimate criticism.

I now wish to call attention to some of the Decrees. The first Decree establishes the right of the natives to the lands they occupy according to local customs. The rights of occupation are to be scheduled in accordance with regulations to be issued by the Governor-General. This involves, of course, a survey. In every village the extent of land occupied by natives is to be trebled, and even a further extension can be sanctioned by the head of the State. If necessary, expropriation will be applied in order to give effect to this rule. The natives are not allowed to alienate their property without the previous sanction of the Governor-General. Seed and plants are to be placed gratuitously at the disposal of the cultivators, and they will receive guidance with respect to proper cultivation. Their rights in the forests and fisheries are recognised with proper safeguards. This Decree is certainly a step in the right direction, if it is carried out properly, especially in that part of the territory in which companies have obtained concessions, as well as in the national domain and in that of the Crown.

The next Decree has reference to direct and personal taxes. It is left to the Governor-General to settle the tax, keeping in view the resources of the different districts and of the population and the condition of the natives. The tax cannot be less than six francs or more than twenty-four francs annually. Therefore, it will always be less than one pound. The tax can be paid in produce or in labour. The heads of districts determine what produce will be received in payment and its value. They also settle the labour and its value. It must not in any case exceed forty hours a month. The Decree states that in order to create in the natives a taste for work they will receive for produce and for labour such remuneration as takes into account the value of the produce and the standard of wages in the district. The remuneration will be paid in kind or in vouchers, which will be exchanged in kind at the warehouses of the State. I need hardly point out that the efficiency of this reform depends on the effect given to this Decree by the Administration. Forced labour is open to abuse, and the sooner it disappears the better. If the valuation of produce and labour is made on a liberal scale, the abuses which undoubtedly have been proved will tend to disappear.

The Despatch of Sir Edward Grey, dated January 9th last, ought certainly to be carefully considered in this connection. In that Despatch it is pointed out that if the tax is employed for commercial operations it remains open to the imputation of constituting a form of servitude. Sir Edward Grey says—

> "But the labour demanded of the Congolese natives in the from of a 'tax' is not, for the most part, employed for objects of general utility in which they are themselves interested; it is employed by the State, or by the trading companies, to whom the right to levy the 'tax' is delegated, for the advancement of commercial operations, in which the native has no interest, and from which he can receive no benefit."

That delegation, I believe, will be no longer possible under this Decree which repeals Article 35 of the Decree of the 18th November, 1903. Sir Edward Grey proceeds—

> "A system which compels the personal service of the citizen for such a purpose as this—and it is to be observed that the provisions in Article 34 of the Law of the 18th of November, 1903, enabling the native to fulfil his obligations to the State by other means, have proved in the Congo to be almost entirely illusory—must always, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, remain open to the imputation of constituting a form of servitude, differing in essence but little from actual slavery."

With that opinion of the Secretary of State I entirely agree. Then he further proceeds to say—

> "His Majesty's Government are not aware of any grounds for supposing that the natives of the Congo, if provided with land for cultivation or offered employment as labourers, would show less willingness to work for the same object, and the habit of work thus acquired would, no doubt, in the Congo as in British Africa, eventually conquer their natural indolence and lead them to engage in the cultivation of the soil and in trade, not merely to fulfil their obligations to the State, but to ameliorate their own position. While protesting, however, against the theoretical justification of the existing system, which is contained in the Report—a system resulting in the substitution in the Congo of forced labour for the hired labour, by means of which the development of the other parts of Africa is effected—His Majesty's Government are glad to note that the Commissioners consider that, in practice, no native should be compelled to pay his contribution to the State in the form of labour if he can find the means to pay it in money or produce. His Majesty's Government earnestly commend this suggestion to the favourable consideration of the Congo Government, but they would point out that the reality of the reform, doubtless aimed at by the Commission, consists not so much in the proposed amplification of Article 34 of the existing Law as in removing the obstacles which at present preclude the natives from taking advantage of it."

Lord Reay.

Whether the Decree will fully give effect to this advice given by Sir Edward Grey I admit is open to doubt, and I think it would be well to enforce this advice on every occasion which will be given to His Majesty's Government to enforce it.

The next Decree deals with the collective tax. The native chiefs are made responsible for the collective tax, which is assessed on a group of individuals. The chiefs are salaried and exempt of the tax. It is obvious that abuses may easily arise if the chiefs are inclined to act arbitrarily in the collection of the tax, and strict supervision will have to be exercised. An important reform is that the collection of taxes will only be carried out by officials of the State, and that private individuals will no longer be allowed to act as collectors. The system of armed sentries is abolished with regard to the collection of taxes. Individual assessment will be the rule, and collective assessment will only be tolerated where individual assessment is impracticable. The improvement of communications is mentioned in the Report as necessary in order to facilitate transport. This is self-evident, and necessitates expenditure on a large scale.

The next Decree I wish to allude to is that on the tribal chiefs. It appeared that both Commissions were of opinion that the recognition of the authority of the tribal chiefs was important for the better government of the State. The Government of the Congo itself is convinced of the importance of maintaining the tribe under the authority of its chief, and, what is of even greater importance, of its customs. They are of opinion that this institution strengthens the authority of the State and improves the social condition of the natives. The chief has no other rights than those which are stated in the Deed of Investiture. Among other duties, he is bound to assist the local authorities in the levying of militia and of labourers, and in providing the supplies which are required. It is quite clear that without sufficient control abuses may easily arise. If it is intended that the native chief should protect the members of his tribe, and that he should be punished for any illegality he may commit, the system may be accepted. In the absence of a sufficient number of trained officials, there is no alternative. Provision should be made for training the heirs of chiefs, so that they should be able to discharge their duties when called upon to succeed.

Both Commissions were of opinion that for public works—roads, railways, fortifications—forced labour was justifiable. A Decree limits the liability to such labour to a period of five years. In this case, again, the conditions under which this Decree is applied must affect the criticism of a measure which in principle must be considered opposed to sound economics. A Decree has been issued, in accordance with the recommendations of both Commissions, to distinguish between police and military operations. In the Report of the second Commission it is also laid down that care should be taken that companies and private individuals should not engage in armed expeditions, which is already prohibited. The Decree does not allow a military expedition to be undertaken until an effort has been made to restore order by other means. It is admitted in the Report that the number of European officers—one to fifty men—ought to be doubled in order that strict supervision may be exercised. The Report states that this will be done as soon as the public exchequer can dispense the necessary funds.

Inspectors are to be appointed to secure to the natives their lawful rights, and to see that their mutual relations, and those with State officials and private individuals should be in accordance with the regulations. They will exercise their duties especially in the territories owned by or leased to private companies. The inspectors will receive complaints from and against the natives and will inform the judicial authorities of any breaches of the law. If these inspectors are carefully selected, and if they are sufficiently numerous, they may be able to prevent and put a stop to arbitrary proceedings. But in Sir Edward Grey's Despatch of January 9th the root of the evil is dealt with. Sir Edward Grey says—

> "In dealing with the question of the concessionary companies, the commissioners express the view that the ideal remedy for the abuses noted within the concessions would be to deprive these companies of all administrative power. His Majesty's Government hold that the exercise of administrative functions by persons or companies who have acquired the whole trade of the area which they are called upon to administer must lead to grave irregularities, and they would have welcomed a declaration by the Commission condemning the association of trade and administration, whether in the person of concessionary companies or in that of the State itself. It is much to be regretted that the Commissioners should have ignored altogether the evils of State-trading, and failed to recommend, in the case of the companies, the practical adoption of the remedy which they themselves recognise as 'ideal.'"

I need hardly say that I am in cordial agreement with the advice here given to the Government of the Congo State by the Foreign Secretary, and it certainly is to be regretted that in these Decrees there is nothing showing that any effect has been given to that advice.

The strictures of the Commission of inquiry on the judicial system have led to a Decree which establishes circuit courts. The recruitment of trained jurists is difficult, but their increase is clearly required for the effective administration of justice. We must I think accept these Decrees as evidence of the recognition by the Government of the Congo State that reforms were urgently needed. These reforms are tentative, and must lead to further reforms in the same direction.

As regards trade, in the Circular Despatch of August 8th, 1903, it was stated that—

> "Article 1 of the Berlin Act provides that the trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom in the basin of the Congo; and Article V. provides that no Power which exercises Sovereign rights in the basin shall be allowed to grant therein a monopoly or favour of any kind in matters of trade. In the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the system of trade now existing in the Independent State of the Congo is not in harmony with these provisions."

The Despatch further stated that—

> "His Majesty's Government will be glad to receive any suggestions which the Governments of the signatory Powers may be disposed to make in reference to this important question, which might perhaps constitute, wholly or in part, the subject of a reference to the tribunal at the Hague."

I wish to ask my noble friend the Under-Secretary whether any suggestions have been received, and whether reference to the Tribunal at the Hague is considered by His Majesty's Government as a possible solution.

It should be noticed that Belgium is not responsible in any way for the affairs of the Congo. Belgium is one of the best-governed countries on the continent, and its prosperous condition is the result of its wise Government. I will quote the opinion of M. Beernaert, the eminent Belgian statesman, than whom no one can express an opinion of greater weight on the affairs of the Congo. M. Beernaert stated in the Belgian Chamber on March 1st that—

> "Belgium to-day has no right whatever to take over the Congo, and it is deliberately, voluntarily, but against my wishes, that she renounced that right under the form of an ill-defined adjournment. Freely also, and after examination, did Parliament renounce all control and all demand for information which the preceding Convention assured to our country, and gave to the Congo State its full liberty of management and borrowing powers."

Then he added—

> "These are matters which we may regret, and I need hardly tell the House that this is my personal feeling."

That is a very authoritative expression of opinion with regard to the affairs of the Congo, and I can only add that I hope that His Majesty's Government will be able in the future as in the past to exercise its due influence so that in the Congo State an administration may be introduced worthy of its founders and worthy of the virtues of the Belgian people, with whom, although it has no legal link, it is certainly in many respects connected and will ultimately become more closely related.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Lord FITZMAURICE): My Lords, there is a very wide interest felt in this country in the question which has just been brought forward by my noble friend in his comprehensive speech. He has sketched very correctly the history of the matter in its main lines. It is not necessary, therefore, that I should take up the time of your Lordships by explaining the nature of the successive Commissions—the Commission of Examination and the Commission of Reform, which have been dealt with by my noble friend; but I would like to take the earliest opportunity of paying a deserved tribute of respect and admiration to an eminent British Civil servant, a member of the Consular Service, whose work was preliminary to that of both the Commissions. It is within the knowledge of many of your Lordships that at an earlier stage in these transactions Mr Robert Casement was sent to the Congo to make a Report, so that the Foreign Office might be informed whether or not they could attach credence to the statements made by gentlemen in this country and others who had taken up the question of the government or, as they called it, the misgovernment, of the Congo State. Mr. Casement had an exceedingly difficult task, and was subject to all those perils of flood and field which a man who has work to do in the interior of Africa has to encounter. He had, moreover, to carry on an inquiry which could not fail to be more or less disagreeable to those concerned, and to make him an object of suspicion and dislike to them. It is, as has been pointed out, unfortunate that the Report of the first Commission was not accompanied by the evidence, but the Report is sufficient to vindicate Mr. Casement. That gentleman has been the object of many unjust attacks, and I am sure I am giving utterance to the feelings of all here when I express the hope that Mr. Casement, whom reasons of health have compelled to retire from an appointment which he held at Lisbon, will have an opportunity of adding further services to those with which his name is already associated.

My noble friend has placed before your Lordships a considerable number of details in regard to the work of the second Commission. Although we have the Decrees, of which I have placed a considerable number of copies in the Library, we have not the text of the Report on which they were founded.

But the documents we have are quite sufficient. If I desired—not that I do so—to take up the time of the House by a long indictment of the Government of the Congo Free State as Mr. Casement found it, I am quite satisfied with one simple fact. The Quarterly Review—a great English literary and political organ, not addicted to being the too ready recipient of every tale which the missionary or humanitarian may bring from distant parts of the world—placed on record in a most complete and carefully written article, published in January, the opinion that in many of these large districts in the Congo, and especially in the Abir district, worked by the so-called Abir Company, such a condition of things has existed, and to a certain extent exists still, that the old Government of the Arab slave traders had some features which entitled it to a more favourable opinion from civilised persons than the Government of the Congo Free State, which dispossessed and succeeded the Arab Empire.

Turning to the condition of things described by my noble friend, I may say that I have done my best to make myself master of the net result of the Decrees. The first thing that strikes me is that one of the most important recommendations of the Commission, basing itself on the Report of the earlier Commission, has not been carried out, and it is a very vital one. The Commission recommended that the Procureur-D'Etat, who has now become Procureur-Général, should be absolutely independent of the Governor-General as regards the prosecution of the offenders, except in cases where the security of the State was at stake. The Government of the Congo have refused to adopt that recommendation, and by leaving the previous legislation unaltered have confirmed the power of the Governor-General to stop legal proceedings which he considers inopportune.

I am willing to grant that if one takes the mere letter of these bulky Decrees and isolates them from the surrounding circumstances, and regards them as operating under a Government able and willing to enforce them, the position of the native in the Congo Free State might really be regarded as so idyllic that some of your Lordships on leaving this House might almost be disposed to take a ticket immediately for the Congo. But I cannot say that the matter really works out in practice in that way. No doubt it may be said that the native of a rubber-bearing district in one of the big concessions will live on the extensive lands which had for centuries been in the occupation of his tribe under the authority of his chief. That is what the Decrees seem to contemplate. He will pay a tax of between 4s. 10d. and 19s. 4d. a year, which sum he will procure either by the sale of his rubber to the highest bidder among the traders, who will be free to set up their establishments on the native reserves, or by working as the hired labourer of the concessionary company for a fair wage—the companies are to be induced to pay wages in money as much as possible—until he has earned the necessary sum, or, if he is foolish enough to prefer this roundabout way, by working out his tax in not more than forty hours' labour a month on the concession. The tranquillity of his existence is broken perhaps once by compulsory service as a paid labourer on a work of public utility for five years, or seven years in the army, and occasionally by a slight corvée of short duration. If a European ill-treats him, he has easy access to one of the travelling magistrates, who can deal with the case by himself, if it is trivial, and if not send it before a territorial Court, or if the offence is very grave, before one of the four new Courts of first instance. If the European is sentenced and appeals, the native need not go to Boma to be present at the trial on appeal, as the Appeal Court will judge sur pièces. If he has a dispute with his employer about his wages, the travelling magistrate can decide the question, if the amount involved is under £4, without appeal. If the native is idle and will not provide himself with the money to pay his tax, he is given two warnings, at intervals of a fortnight (if his tax is payable monthly), and then, if he has not paid, he may be imprisoned with hard labour at the nearest Government post for not more than one month in the case of a first offence and not more than three months in any case. No official inferior to a chef de secteur may order his imprisonment on this account, and the company's agents have no say in the matter at all. His wife cannot be imprisoned for his own failure to pay.

If this were really to be the happy existence of the natives, the concessionary companies would, to say the least of it, find their profits enormously reduced, and very quickly reduced, an eventuality which the State will not be too anxious to permit. The delimitation of the lands to be accorded to natives is left entirely to the discretion of the Governor-General, and the State, be it remembered, is still to take half profits in the company concessions besides being an immense owner itself. Therefore, while the opportunities of ill-treating the natives are slightly lessened, the chance that the opportunities still left will be made the most of is as great as it ever was, seeing that the State is still the chief trader in the country, and that there is still no real guarantee that offenders will be brought to justice.

Some more admirable laws have been added to the statute-book of the Congo State. There was, perhaps, not a great deal to be said before against many of the laws. A fairly ideal picture could have been drawn under the old state of things; but the conditions which made former legislation in practice absolutely useless for the protection of natives remain, so far as I am able to judge, substantially unaltered. If the spirit of the law had been observed before, the Congo would have been a paradise; if the spirit of the law were observed now, it would be a paradise, with a few extra attractions thrown in. It is difficult, however, to see why or how the law should be carried out as long as the conditions to which I have already referred exist, as long as the State is itself the principal trader, while at the same time the Governor-General is the judge of the extent of the native lands, and the administration of native justice, though organised in a faultless manner on paper, does not afford any real or substantial security. I am afraid that I must say that under these circumstances the ticket to the Congo, which I referred to just now, had better, perhaps, on grounds of ordinary prudence and foresight, be a return ticket.

The question will, of course, be asked, What under these circumstances is the position of His Majesty's Government? I am glad to think that here again we are able to look back with complete agreement upon the policy of our predecessors. This country has certain rights in regard to what goes on in this vast territory. But our rights are hedged about in various ways which give rise to diplomatic difficulties. The noble Marquess opposite, when Foreign Secretary, issued the appeal to which reference has been made. But so far as I know the only Sovereign who really sent anything like a real reply to that appeal was the Sultan of Turkey, who stated that he felt a great interest in this question. That is one of the ironies of the situation. Yesterday your Lordships were discussing Macedonia; to-day we are discussing the Congo.

Under the Berlin Act we, in common with the other signatories, have certain rights which cover the vast basin of the Congo which nothing except a further Act of the signatory Powers can alter or change. I might compare the position of the ruler of the Congo State, on coming into his kingdom, to the position of a man buying or inheriting an encumbered estate. He finds that there are mortgages upon it. He finds also, perhaps, that it is subject to a variety of easements and serving rights, which he is bound to recognise. I need not again enumerate the main conditions of the Berlin Act, but I would desire to remind the House that amongst them is the right of the Powers to establish an International River Commission on the Congo, which I have always believed, if established, would be the means, like the Danube Commission was, of upholding the flag of civilisation by its presence in these waste and neglected regions of the earth. But we have other rights under the Convention of 1884 which first recognised the existence of the International Association of the Congo out of which the Free State grew. One of the most important of these is the right to establish Consular Courts. It may be said that this would not directly benefit the natives. Nevertheless, when we are aware that a British subject, the Rev. Mr. Stannard, a missionary of high character, to whose reputation testimony has been borne by the officials of the Congo State, amongst whom he has lived and had his being for a considerable time, has only quite recently been placed upon his trial, and when we are expecting hour by hour to know what the result of that trial may be, and remembering what took place at the trial of Mr. Stokes, which was one of the most disgraceful judicial farces which ever sullied the annals of what purported to be a Court of justice, we can have no intention of abandoning our right to establish Consular Courts in the Congo State, and we on the contrary attach great importance to that right.

When the Congo Free State first came into existence it was placed before the world as a great philanthropic enterprise; and when acting as Under-Secretary to Lord Granville, I was the mark for many attacks by those who thought that I was indifferent to this great philanthropic enterprise that was to carry civilisation into the heart of Africa. And now, twenty years after these events, I find the writer in the Quarterly Review using these words—

> "Whoever they may be—British, Belgian, German, or what not—the names of the directors of the Abir Company should be published in full; and the owners of those names should then and there retire into private life as the only expiation they can make for having, consciously or unconsciously, left so dark a stain in the heart of the Congo Free State. They have directed a policy which has resulted in the death of several thousand defenceless savages, the mutilation of many more, the outraging of women, the destruction of homes, and the depopulation of a once well-peopled land."

After the events that have occurred in the Congo, every right this country possesses, diplomatically or morally, is a right that we ought to stand upon. But in all these matters we have not only to bear in mind what our rights are, but the time and the opportunity. I am inclined to think that we shall be upon firmer ground, when the time comes for more active interference, by now standing upon what I may call the broad equities of the situation, rather than upon comparatively small legal points. But for the moment our duty is to indicate the great gaps which exist in the scheme of reforms, and to do everything we can to encourage the Government of the Free State to give as real and as wide an operation as possible to these reforms.

There was an idea on the Continent of Europe at one time that the campaign of the Congo Reform Association in this country was either the action of a few misguided enthusiasts, or only the work of some Protestant fanatics. No doubt the action of those who laboured in this cause was very greatly hampered by that impression abroad. Now, fortunately, those ideas have entirely disappeared. In Catholic as well as in Protestant countries, and in Catholic as much as in Protestant circles in Belgium, it is now recognised that this campaign was in no manner either the work of misguided fanaticism or of Protestant bigotry. One of the most eloquent denouncers of what has been done has been that eminent Roman Catholic statesman, who some time ago was the much respected Prime Minister of Belgium. I refer to M. Beernhart. This great Belgian statesman himself gave voice to the feelings of outraged humanity upon this question. Among the severest critics of the Congo State are not only M. Cattier, the eminent Belgian jurist, and M. Vandevelde, the great Parliamentary Labour Leader, but also Father Vermeesch, a well known Roman Catholic ecclesiastic. It is therefore our duty to believe that public opinion in Belgium, which is much more powerful, because nearer, is rapidly bringing to bear on the official heads of the Congo State a pressure which will cause not only the enforcement of these Decrees, but their re-issue in a revised and far more drastic form.

It is our interest and policy in this country to support the legitimate action of Belgian opinion, and to be most careful not to suggest by word or deed that any attack is being made on the Belgian Government or people. We desire that it should be theirs to move in the matter, and they know best when the circumstances are favourable. Whether this matter is one which can be brought before The Hague Conference is a question to which I cannot give a positive answer. The sphere of work of the future Hague Conference is still a topic of consideration among the Powers; and I cannot hold out too great hopes. But the idea is present to the mind of the Secretary of State, and no opportunity to press forward this question will be lost. But, on the other hand, I hope and believe that the extremely complicated character of the task which His Majesty's Government have in Africa and the Congo will be recognised.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I do not desire to add many words to the statement to which we have just listened. My noble friend has spoken strongly, but not at all too strongly, of the manner in which the Government of the Congo State has discharged the responsibilities which, in a moment of mistaken confidence, were thrown upon it by the Great Powers. The attitude of the Congo State has been unsatisfactory throughout, and I am bound to say that I do not think it has ever been more unsatisfactory than it is at the present moment. I learn from my noble friend's statement that His Majesty's Government will watch events in the Congo with care, that it is their intention to insist upon our treaty rights, and that we shall certainly not admit the extravagant pretensions which have recently been put forward by the ruler of the Congo State to deal with these vast territories as if they were a private chattel of his own, and without guidance or direction from outside.

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has lately announced that he claims for the signatory Powers the right to take such steps as they may consider called for to ensure the observance by the independent State of its obligations; and I trust that he may be successful in inducing the other Powers to act with us in this matter. I can scarcely bring myself to believe that, however reluctant they may be, they will be content to acquiesce in the claim of the Sovereign of the Congo State in the shape in which it has been most recently presented to the public. Nothing could, I venture to think, be more humiliating to the Great Powers than to acquiesce in such a position; and nothing certainly could be more humiliating to us; for we may fairly claim that it is this country which from the first has taken a leading part in endeavouring to obtain redress for the wrongs of this misgoverned people.

It was the outburst of indignation in this country which first called attention to these occurrences. Then came the mission of Mr. Consul Casement, to whom my noble friend referred in terms of commendation which were thoroughly well deserved. Mr. Casement's report certainly had the effect of raising a corner of the curtain behind which were shrouded the iniquities that had been going on for many years. It led to the Commission of Inquiry whose report was very valuable, although it was given to the world—in spite of the assurances that had been obtained—without the all-important evidence on which it was founded. That report, even if allowance be made for the fact that in remote regions of this kind a certain amount of hardship and rough usage is inevitable, disclosed a condition of things more deplorable than anything which we could have ventured to imagine for ourselves. We have had discussions in this House as to what is and what is not slavery; but there was certainly brought to light in Mr. Casement's report and in the report of the Commission of Inquiry the existence of bondage under the most barbarous and inhuman conditions, and maintained for mercenary motives of the most selfish character.

What is the latest phase of these transactions? We are presented with a collection of Decrees which, no doubt, contain the outline of many reforms such as might be of great advantage if full effect were given to them; but it is, I believe, the universal opinion that these Decrees still leave room for the existence of some of the worst abuses which have prevailed in recent years in the Congo. They contemplate, although perhaps in a modified form, forced labour; and forced labour under the supervision of the officials of the Congo Government is forced labour in its very worst shape. Then, again, as I understand them, they leave the local courts subject to the interference of the Executive Government—a state of things which is not very likely to conduce to the administration of justice.

Again, they contain, as far as we are aware, no provisions rendering it necessary that the accounts of these provinces should be made public. It is to information as to the financial condition of the country above everything else that it is desirable that the public should have access. We know that these concessionaire companies are making enormous profits. I see it stated that the £20 shares of some of them are quoted at £600. These huge profits are wrung out of the suffering population of the Congo, and there is no means of ascertaining how much or how little of the money thus extorted is devoted to expenditure for providing proper administration. We are told that by these Decrees plots of land owned by these wretched villagers are to be increased. But we all know that it is not out of the little village patches which they cultivate that they earn a livelihood, but that it is on their forest rights upon which these companies have so mercilessly encroached that they are dependent for their existence.

It has been truly said that it is not to the letter of these regulations that we have to look, so much as to the spirit in which the laws and regulations are administered. On that point there is a grain of comfort in these decrees. Three inspectors are, I believe, to be appointed; but they will have 300,000 square miles of territory apiece to look after, so that the grain of comfort is a small one. I trust that His Majesty's Government will keep an eye on the inspectors.

Something has been said as to our right to interest ourselves in these matters. I cannot admit that there is any doubt whatever as to our right. We rely on the spirit as well as the letter of the Berlin Act. What does it say? It lays down that no Power exercising sovereign rights in the above-mentioned regions should be allowed to grant a monopoly or favour of any kind in matters of trade. I believe that the whole country is covered with monopolies, and that each of the concessionaire companies has been given a monopoly of the most objectionable character.

The next clause in the Act states that all the Powers exercising sovereign rights or influence in the territories bind themselves to watch over the preservation of the native tribes and their moral and physical well-being, and to help in suppressing slavery and the slave trade. These words, read by the light of what we know to be going on in the Congo, seem almost to be ironically written. I say, therefore, that our right is perfectly clear. But I may add, quite irrespective of any right we enjoy under the letter of these Acts, that we have a moral right to interfere which comes to us in consequence of the false pretences—I cannot use a gentler word—under which the Congo State has acquired its privileged position in that part of Africa. There can be no doubt that when this country acquiesced in the original arrangement most people believed that what they were doing was to give to the Belgian Government a certain control over the regions in question. We know how great a difference there is between the Government of Belgium—the enlightened and wise Government of Belgium—and the Administration of the Congo Independent State.

One word as to the remedies to which it is possible for us to look in the hope of contributing something towards the introduction of a better state of things. We entered into a specific agreement in 1884—an agreement executed between Sir E. Malet and the representative of the then Congo Association—under which we were guaranteed the most-favoured-nation treatment in the Congo, and under which we especially reserved the right to exercise consular jurisdiction within it. I agree with my noble friend that this was a very important reservation; and all I can say is that I hope, if these abuses continue, we shall claim our right to appoint consuls in the Congo. I do not care in the least whether there are British subjects to look after or not; but what I do feel is that the presence of half a dozen Englishmen located in the centres of trade within the Congo will be worth more than a whole row of inspectors or officials belonging to the Administration of the Congo Free State.

But besides this, I should certainly not abandon the hope that, should these abuses continue, the Powers, who are signatories of the Berlin Treaty, will consider, in a favourable spirit, a proposal that a conference should be again summoned to examine the whole question, and how far the promises, held out to these Powers at the time when the Congo Government was created, have been fulfilled or not. The assembly of such a conference would, I am confident, have the effect of leading to proposals which would result in a better state of things. I repeat that I guard myself, as the speakers who have preceded me have done, from being supposed to make any complaint or criticism of the Belgian Government. I believe, on the contrary, that the Belgian Government, or the members of it, abhor and regret these occurrences as much as we do. Personally, I should be delighted to see the Congo State transferred to the Belgian Government. I hope it may some day be so transferred; and if it is, I trust it will be transferred under conditions which will give the Belgian Government an absolutely free hand to deal with this concessionaire region, within which the worst abuses prevail, and which claims for itself a kind of immunity from all interference or supervision. The only other remark I will make is this. I trust that we may have some at all events of the Papers to which reference has been made in this debate and in the public Press.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I rejoice to think that the speeches delivered here this evening will find an echo outside, not in England only, but beyond the sea, and not least in Belgium itself. The story of these Congo misdeeds is as extraordinary in its character as it is melancholy in its incidents; and it is a strange dénouement that what was originally regarded as a great philanthropic enterprise should a few years afterwards become a source of bewilderment to those of us who have no special opportunity of being conversant with the details of matters of this kind.

In this ignorance of the precise facts as to what is going on wise men always shrink from being ready to lend themselves too readily to some obvious popular outcry about something which may be only imperfectly understood. That danger, real at all times, is increased when we are dealing, not merely with a question of administration in some savage or semi-savage country, but with what may be supposed at all events to concern the administration of a civilised and friendly State. But the story has now been revealed to the world, not by mawkish sentimentalists or by unbalanced enthusiasts who are raising some mere fanatical outcry, but by an investigation carried on by competent men. It has taught us that cautious as we ought to be not to join too readily in an outcry which may often prove to be exaggerated or baseless, we ought, on the other hand, to be cautious lest we too readily put down to fanaticism or prejudice the protests which we sometimes treat too lightly because we think that the facts alleged are too bad to be true. That is the moral we have to remember on one side as well as on the other when we read of what is taking place in the Congo State.

But to-night's speeches will do very real good in this matter. From noble Lords on each side of the House who are in the best possible position to know all the facts, we have had wise and weighty words both as to the present condition of things and as to the possibility of moving in the direction of amendment. I rejoice to hear the voice of those who speak from Foreign Office experience on each side of the House proclaiming that it is clearly at this juncture the duty of Great Britain to use every right which the country possesses, diplomatic as well as moral, and to stand on those rights. We are dealing with broad considerations of principle rather than with legal technicalities. In what we are urging, we are anxious to make it clear that our criticism is directed not in any sense against the Belgian Government, which is not, as a Government, concerned or responsible. We are denouncing offenders, be they many or few, against whom a protest is here raised for wrongs which the whole world has felt to be intolerable, and which must not be allowed to continue. It is the earnest hope of every thoughtful man that the effort will be crowned with success.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of RIPON): My Lords, I rise to emphasise not only to your Lordships, but to those to whom the words of this debate may go, the absolute unanimity which exists on both sides of the House as to this question. There has been no difference of opinion expressed. Noble Lords who have spoken have spoken with authority, and they are all agreed both as to the general course of policy and the steps which the Government are likely to take. We have a great responsibility in this matter, and I also declare that the Powers who signed the Act of Berlin have a great responsibility in common with us. I regret that the appeal made by my noble friend to the other Powers met with but indifferent success, but the policy which dictated that appeal is as much the policy of the present Government as it was the policy of noble Lords opposite when they were in power. I welcome the advance of public opinion in Belgium on this matter, and I think that we are bound to do nothing that would check the free expression of that public opinion. The Belgian people have great interests involved in this matter, and your Lordships may be sure that the course His Majesty's Government will pursue will not be one calculated to promote any jealousy in the Belgian Government, who have little or no responsibility in this matter, except the moral responsibility of being, as it were, indirectly connected with it. But that, my Lords, will not deter His Majesty's Government from pursuing a course which they may think to be right for the purpose of maintaining and discharging their own responsibility.

I am very glad to find that my noble friend opposite feels, as we feel, that we have still in reserve, whenever we may think fit to exercise it, a very valuable power in connection with the appointment of consuls in the Congo. I make no declaration as to the time when a step of that kind may be taken; but I do think it is an excellent thing that there should have gone forth from this House to those in other countries who are interested in this matter, and have grave and serious responsibilities in respect to it, an absolutely unanimous declaration as to policy in this question.

HAMMERSMITH, CITY AND NORTH EAST LONDON RAILWAY BILL.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. EMMOTT, Oldham) moved that the promoters of the Hammersmith City and North-East London Bill should have leave to suspend the Bill and proceed with it next session. He explained that the reason for this long motion was that the promoters of rival schemes had differed as to the meaning of a letter sent to them by the Board of Trade, with the result that, while the Hammersmith and City Scheme had been brought forward this year, the other scheme had not. At a Conference with the Board of Trade, the Chairman of the Lords Committee and himself, it had been decided that the Bill should not be allowed to proceed this session, and the object of the Motion was simply to save the promoters the expense and trouble of bringing in new plans, petitions, etc.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Promoters of the Hammersmith, City, and North East London Railway Bill which has been introduced into this House in the present session of Parliament, shall have leave to suspend any further proceedings thereon, in order to proceed with the same Bill, if they shall think fit, in the next session of Parliament, provided that notice of their intention to do so be lodged in the Private Bill Office not later than six o'clock on the day prior to the close of the present session, and that all fees due thereon up to that period be paid.

"That the money deposited in accordance with the Standing Orders of this House in respect of such Bill may thereupon be returned to the depositors.

"That the Promoters of such Bill may, on or before the 31st day of December next, deposit in the Private Bill Office an Estimate, signed by the person making the same, of the expense of the undertaking under the Bill, and, previously to the 15th day of January next, deposit a sum not less than five per centum on the amount of such Estimate with the Paymaster-General.

"That such Bill shall be referred to the Examiners, who shall certify whether or not the Promoters have made such deposit with the Paymaster-General, and, upon the Examiners certifying that such deposit has been made, that the proceedings on such Bill shall be pro forma only in regard to all other stages through which the same shall have passed in the present session, and no new fees shall be charged in regard to such stages.

"That such Bill shall be deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than six o'clock on or before the third day on which the House shall sit in the next session of Parliament, with a declaration annexed thereto, signed by the agent stating that the Bill is the same in every respect as the Bill at the last stage of the proceedings thereon in this House in the present session.

"That if the money deposited in the present session, as required by Standing Order No. 57, in respect of such Bill has not been withdrawn as provided for by the preceding Resolutions, a certificate of that fact from the proper officer of the court in which such money was deposited shall accompany such declaration, and such Bill shall not be referred to the Examiners:

"That such Bill, indorsed by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office as having been duly deposited with such declaration and such certificate, if any, annexed, be laid by one of the Clerks of that Office upon the Table of the House in the next session of Parliament:

"That such Bill, so laid upon the Table, shall be deemed to have been read a first time:

"That the Standing Orders by which the proceedings on Bills are regulated, shall not apply to such Bill in regard to any of the stages through which the same shall have passed during the present session:

"That all Petitions presented in the present session against such Bill shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next session of Parliament, and that all Notices and grounds of objections to the right of Petitioners to be heard, given in the present session within the time prescribed by the Rules of the Referees relating to such Notices, shall be held applicable in the next session of Parliament:

"That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on such Bill, unless their Petition shall have been presented within the time limited in the present session or in respect of which Standing Order No. 128 has been dispensed with in the present session, or unless their Petition shall be presented on or before the 12th day of February, 1907."—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said this was the strongest order he had ever known with regard to a Private Bill. It was a piece of special indulgence, and they ought to be told what precedents there were for it. They were asked to make a Standing Order for the benefit of private promoters.

MR. EMMOTT: It will lapse at the end of the next session.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he was aware of that, but he felt bound to enter a protest, especially as in all his experience no similar indulgence had ever been granted to small tiny Irish Bills which could not afford to pay the tremendous fees imposed, and which had no influence to secure this special treatment.

And, it being Three of the Clock, the Debate stood postponed until To-morrow, by the direction of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Distances from Galway.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN (Galway): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will give the Admiralty correct distances, in knots, from Galway to each of the following places, viz. Regulations for Motor Omnibuses.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH (Strand, Westminster): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is any limit laid down to the weight and size of the motor omnibus; and whether in considering regulations for governing the future use of this class of vehicles, there will be taken into consideration the great vibration caused by them, especially when fully loaded and proceeding at a considerable pace over an uneven surface.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) Limits as to the weight, length, height, and width of motor omnibuses have been laid down in a regulation which is now under the consideration of a Select Committee of the House of Commons, who will, no doubt, in their Report, deal with the vibration caused by these vehicles.

Salaries of Macedonian Officials.

MR. SILCOCK (Somersetshire, Wells): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the salaries of officials in Macedonia have been paid to date and the deficit for the month of May been made good by the Porte as provided in the Réglement; and, if not, what steps will be taken by the Powers to insure such payment.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) The Answer to the first and second parts of this Question is in the negative. In regard to the third part, the representatives of the Powers are urging the Porte to lose no time in finding the requisite money to make good the deficit on the Macedonian budget.

Chinese Customs Officials.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can make any further statement to the House in regard to the Imperial edict of the Chinese Government, appointing Chinese officials at the head of the Imperial Maritime Customs; and whether he can lay upon the Table the correspondence with the Chinese Government on this subject before the Foreign Office Vote is taken on Thursday next.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) As stated in Answer to a Question on June 12th, † His Majesty's Government regard the note of the Wai-wu-pu, respecting the Customs question, as satisfactory, and they are awaiting the issue of instructions to Sir R. Hart which, as I said yesterday in reply to a Question on the same subject, will, it is understood, be in accordance with the assurances given to His Majesty's Government. As soon as the text of the note referred to is received it will be presented to Parliament.

Boring for Oil in Lagos.

MR. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that oil has been found in the bitumen fields of Lagos on the West Coast of Africa; whether he has taken or will take steps to ensure that the local Colonial authorities are aware of the danger of allowing inexperienced persons to bore in oil-bearing strata, especially where water exists; and whether he can see his way to endeavour to secure the closest restrictions upon the method of boring, in order to avoid injury to the oil fields and consequent loss of revenue to the Colony.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The information which has reached the Colonial Office is to the effect that no actual discovery of oil has been made, although it is possible that it may be found. The attention of the local Government will be called to the danger referred to, and any necessary precautions will be taken.

Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's claim for Rent.

MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under Lyne): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that the late Colonial Secretary wrote that Mendelssohn and Bruce's claim for rent, &c., amounting to £9,525, could not in any way be entertained, but that they were entitled to receive all the profits made, and that it was only after the discovery of profit made (July, 1905) that he subsequently wrote (October, 1905) that a proper course was to pay a reasonable rental for the premises; and will he state why, after writing that the claim for rent, &c., could not in any way be entertained he afterwards came to a contrary conclusion.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Mr. Lyttelton informed Sir J. Puleston, in March, 1905, that he considered that the claim of Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce for rent should not be admitted, but that they were entitled to receive a refund of profits, and in December, 1905, he informed the same gentleman that Lord Selborne had very carefully gone into the matter and had come to the conclusion that the proper course was to pay Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce a reasonable rental for their premises, as had been done in other cases. Mr. Lyttelton pointed out that Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's original claim was for rent, and stated that Lord Selborne was convinced that the legislature of the Colony would unhesitatingly reject any proposal to pay on the basis of profits; the reasons for this conviction being that the profits appeared to be far in excess of what the firm, which has never been able to declare a dividend, could have earned had they had the free use of their premises, and that those profits appeared to exceed greatly the rental they could reasonably have expected to receive during the period that their premises were occupied by the administration.

Post Office Savings Bank Accounts.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he can give the number of Savings Bank depositors' accounts in Great Britain and Ireland respectively on which no transactions have taken place (beyond the recording of interest due), or deposit books forwarded for examination, for five, ten, fifteen, and twenty years respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The information for which the hon. Member asks could not be given without the expenditure of a very large amount of labour, which I do not think would be justified.

Post Office Savings Bank—Publication of list of Unclaimed Balance.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Postmaster-General whether a list of unclaimed balances to the credit of depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank who have not forwarded their books for examination, or deposited or withdrawn money for a certain number of years, has ever been published; and, if not, whether, in view of the amount of Savings Bank money which, under the present system, can never be claimed, he will in future cause such list to be periodically published.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) A list of the nature suggested has never been published. Its compilation would involve a very large amount of work and considerable expense. Its publication would be certain to give rise to a large number of erroneous and fictitious claims, and I am of opinion that it would not be found to be sufficiently useful to counterbalance these disadvantages.

Post Office Savings Bank—Index of Depositors.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that in the case of a savings bank depositor who loses his deposit book, and is unable to give particulars of the book or date of a recent transaction to the Savings Bank Department, such depositor cannot withdraw his money owing to the fact that no index of depositors' names is kept in the Savings Bank Department; and whether he will arrange to have such an index prepared.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the representative of a deceased person, supposed to have been a savings bank depositor, who is unable to give particulars of deceased's deposit book, cannot withdraw the money which may be legally due to him owing to the fact that no index of names is kept in the Savings Bank Department; and whether he can state how many such cases have occurred in Great Britain and Ireland respectively during the last five years, and in how many cases have inquirers been informed by the Savings Bank Department that, owing to the fact that no index of depositors' names is kept, no information can be given.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I may perhaps Answer these Questions together. The absence of an alphabetical list of depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank is not found to give rise to the difficulties which the hon. Member indicates, as depositors or their representatives are almost always able to furnish sufficient information to enable the department to trace accounts about which inquiry is made. The preparation of a general index would be an undertaking of great magnitude, as it would have to contain upwards of 10,000,000 entries; and its utility would not be sufficient to justify the expense that would be involved.

Telegraphic Facilities in Rural Districts.

MR. R. L. HARMSWORTH (Caithness-shire): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will consider the possibility of giving greater facilities for the despatch of telegrams in rural districts remote from telegraph offices by permitting them to be accepted at the nearest sub-post office, and to be taken from there to the most convenient telegraph office by the local post runners at the usual mileage rate.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) A prepaid telegram may be handed to a rural postman on his way to a telegraph office, or may be posted anywhere, to be sent on by the next collection to the nearest convenient telegraph office. No mileage rate is charged for this service. I am afraid it would be impracticable to arrange that messengers should be available at a country sub-office at any time to carry telegrams at mileage rate to a telegraph office.

Merchant Shipping Statutory Rules and Orders.

MR. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that many of the statutory rules and orders relating to merchant shipping are those made more than twelve years ago under Acts which have now been repealed and consolidated by The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; and whether he will consider the advisability of having this subordinate legislation properly revised and co-ordinated under that Act before the close of the present year.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am aware of the fact that several statutory rules and orders relating to merchant shipping made before 1894 are still in force. These rules and orders were expressly saved by Section 745 (1) (a) of The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and continue as if they had been made under that Act. As the rules or orders become obsolete, or require amendment, they are replaced by new ones made under the Act of 1894. This process is continually going on, and if the hon. Member will inform me of any rules or orders that he thinks need revision, the question of revising them shall be considered.

Compulsory Retirement of Civil Service Writers.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the old writers, not on the establishment of the Civil Service, are to be compulsorily retired in January next; what is the number of such writers, and in what Government offices they are serving; what is approximately their average age, and the average length of their service; and whether the total provision to be made for them in lieu of pensions is a gratuity of £100 to each.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I am not in possession of the particulars asked for in the Question, and I could not obtain them without considerable trouble. I think it, however, sufficient to say that the Treasury circulars issued in December, 1904, on the final closing of the register of copyists, suggested that the remaining copyists then under sixty should be retired at sixty-five, subject to the discretion of heads of departments to continue them, if fully efficient, year by year up to the age of seventy, and that copyists then over sixty should be compulsorily retired at the age of seventy, subject, in the case of those over sixty-eight, to two years' notice. The gratuity referred to is not in lieu of pension; these copyists were never qualified for pension under the Superannuation Acts, and under the terms of their original engagement they had no right even to gratuity on retirement, which was first granted by the Treasury minute of December, 1886. I may add that since the Treasury minute referred to copyists have always been liable to be retired with a gratuity calculated as prescribed by that minute and not exceeding £100.

Flogging for Breaches of Prison Discipline.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthenshire, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state the number of cases in which prisoners have been flogged for breaches of prison discipline during each year from 1900 to 1905; will he state the prison where each sentence was carried out; and whether the medical officer in any instance interfered with the carrying out of the sentence.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) Corporeal punishment can only be imposed in prison for mutiny, incitement to mutiny, and gross personal violence to prison officers. The following statement shows the number of cases of corporeal punishment inflicted in local and convict prisons during each of the years ended

March 31st, 1901 to 1905, and the number of instances in which the medical officer interfered with the carrying out of the sentence:—

Voters at School Board Election—Areas without provided Schools.

SIR E. BOYLE (Taunton): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he will publish a Return showing the percentages of voters who recorded their votes at the last school board elections held in urban areas, with a population of 5,000 and upwards; and whether he will also publish a Return, naming the urban areas with a population of 5,000 and upwards, in which there are no provided schools, or less accommodation in provided schools than would suffice to meet the requirements of 20 per cent. of the school children in such places.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have no information as to the matter referred to in the first paragraph of the Question. As regards the second paragraph, I will lay upon the Table at the end of the week a list of the areas referred to. I am unable to give any figures or facts as to the third paragraph of the Question, nor do I see that any trustworthy information could be obtained from any such figures, if they were available.

Revised Programme for Irish National School Teachers.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Commissioners of National Education stated on the introduction of the revised programme that the efficient instruction of six distinct standards by one teacher was, under the results system, not practicable; and, if so, whether, in the case of such teachers, otherwise eligible, service under these conditions will constitute any barrier to increments or promotion under the present system.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that upon the introduction of their revised programme in 1900 they stated that, as in most small schools the staff consists of a principal teacher only, or of a principal teacher and monitor, it is not practicable to teach separately, and at the same time efficiently, six or even fewer distinct standards. The Commissioners, therefore, announced that they would sanction in small schools the collective instruction in the same subject of two or more standards as one division. The Commissioners inform me that since that time they have issued special programmes suitable for collective instruction in small schools. It is not, therefore, the case that service under the conditions mentioned constitutes a bar to the granting of increments or promotion to teachers otherwise eligible.

Irish Fish Curing Industry.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the advisability of establishing a brand for Irish cured fish similar to that existing in Scotland; whether he will increase the grants to enable the Irish fishing industry to be improved; and whether he will arrange that the breeding places shall be protected by utiltising gunboats and coastguards to prevent illegal trawling.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) In reply to the first part of the Question, I beg to refer to my Answer to the Question put by the hon. Member for South Kerry on June 27th.† The hon. Member will see that the question of establishing a brand for Irish cured fish has been fully considered, and that it has not been thought desirable to adopt a brand. The question of an increased grant for the improvement of the fishing industry can be better considered after the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into the Working of the Department has been received, and it is possible that the fishing industry in some of its aspects may come within the purview of the inquiry into the problem of congestion which it is proposed to conduct. The breeding places of fish where illegal trawling would be likely to take place are effectively patrolled by the vessels "Helga" and "Granuaile," belonging to the Irish Government, and the coastguard give assistance by reporting cases of illegal fishing which come under their notice. I dealt with the matter of assistance by gunboats in my reply to the Question of the hon. Member for East Waterford on June 26th.‡

Attendance of Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald at Petty Session Courts.

Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, resident magistrate, Portarlington, is in such a low state of health as to be unable to attend regularly to his duties; can he say how many Petty Session Courts have been held during the past two years in Mountmellick, Rathangan, Clonbullogue, and Stradbally, respectively, and how many of those Mr. Fitzgerald attended; and what course he proposes taking to supply the public requirements of the district.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The resident magistrate referred to reports that he is not in a low state of health, and the records show that during the past two years he has been absent from duty on account of indisposition on twelve days only. Petty sessions are held fortnightly at Mountmellick and Stradbally, and monthly at Rathangan and Clonbullogue. During the past two years the resident magistrate did not attend petty sessions at Mountmellick or Rathangan, but he attended at Clonbullogue on two, and at Stradbally on five occasions. Petty sessions at Mountmellick, Rathangan, and Clonbullogue fall on days fixed for other petty sessions in the district, at which the resident magistrate's attendance is more desirable. As regards Stradbally, the resident magistrate reports that, whenever he has not attended petty sessions at that place, there was no case for hearing, or the cases were of a trivial nature only. There is, I am informed, a good attendance of local justices at each of the four petty sessions named, and public requirements have not suffered.

Sales on the Wilson Estate—Action of Mr. Patrick Duff.

Mr. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Patrick Duff, a middleman on the Wilson estate in the parish of Drumraney, county Westmeath, bought out his land on which there was a large portion of cut away bog and a number of sub-tenants; that the agent of the estate entered into an arrangement with Mr. Duff, by which he divided five acres of the bog amongst the tenants, to be included in their holdings; and that then the agent and Mr. Duff fixed the terms of the purchase between them without any consultation with the tenants, leaving them solely at his mercy; and whether, seeing that Mr. Duff now refuses to sell to the tenants, and insists on the tenants paying the full amount of their rackrents without any abatement, he will bring this case before the Estates Commissioners in order that they may deal with it satisfactorily to the tenants.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the agreement for purchase signed by Patrick Duff shows that there are upon his holding four sub-tenants, two of whom hold at judicial rents. The Commissioners have no knowledge of the remaining facts stated in the Question. The estate, however, will shortly be inspected, and the Commissioners will direct the special attention of their inspector to the holding mentioned and the sub-tenancies thereon, and also to the question of turbary.

Hours of Duty of Irish Prison Warders.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if, having regard to the physical and mental strain of warders in the Irish prisons service owing to the monotonous nature of their duties, he would consider the advisability of having the summer time table altered so as to lessen the number of hours' duty per day; and if he will inquire if there was general discontent among the warders in the Irish prisons service at the passing over of men of long service in connection with recent appointments and promotions; and if it is the custom that court and escort duty is given exclusively to one officer in the larger prisons in Ireland instead of being given to all equally qualified officers in turn.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the General Prisons Board that it would not be possible to lessen the number of hours of duty per day for prison warders, either in winter or summer, without a considerable increase of staff. There is, I am informed, no general discontent among the warders at the passing over of men of long service, although individuals are, no doubt, sometimes disappointed. It is not the custom that court and escort duty is given exclusively to one officer in the larger prisons in Ireland, nor, on the other hand, is such duty assigned to all equally qualified officers in turn. It is a question for the governor to decide in each instance who is the most suitable officer to send on such duty, which does not involve either relaxation or emolument.

Sale of the Estates of the Commissioners of Endowed Schools.

MR. DELANY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have been able to identify the estate of the Commissioners of Endowed Schools, Ireland, situate at Cappaloughlin, Clonard, Mountrath, Queen's County; whether agreements have been signed by the tenants thereon for purchase of their holdings; whether he can say if a minority of the tenants have withdrawn from the sale; and will their complaints be inquired into before the sale is sanctioned.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Commissioners of Education in Ireland that the majority of their tenants at Cappaloughlin have expressed their willingness to purchase on the terms offered by the Commissioners, but a minority have so far not agreed to the terms. No agreements for purchase have yet been signed, and consequently the matter has not come before the Estates Commissioners. If, however, proceedings for the sale of part only of the estate should come before the Estates Commissioners, they inform me that, before sanctioning the advances applied for, they will make inquiries as to the grounds upon which part of the estate is excluded from the sale.

Raising of Wages at Waltham Abbey and Enfield Lock.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet sufficiently considered the question of raising the wages of the labourers at Waltham Abbey and Enfield Lock from 21s. to 23s. 6d., so as to bring them into conformity with the rate existing elsewhere, and can he make a definite statement on the subject.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The question of raising the minimum wage at these factories from 21s. to 23s. a week (not 23s. 6d. as stated in the Question) has necessitated a somewhat detailed investigation, but it is hoped that it may be possible to announce the decision shortly.

Free Postage for Members of Parliament.

MR. FIELD: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the expediency of arranging that all correspondence sent from the House of Commons by Members who are in attendance shall be free; and whether he is aware that this privilege exists in the Colonies.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) At the beginning of the session I informed the hon. Member that I could not see my way to act upon his suggestion, and I have nothing to add to that statement.

Free Railway Passes for Irish Members.

MR. FIELD: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the expediency of arranging with the carrying companies concerned the arrangement of free travelling to and from the House of Commons to such Irish Members as may desire to do so; and whether he is aware that Members of the Legislature in the Colonies have free passes on all railways in their colony.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) No, Sir, I do not see my way to do what the hon. Member suggests. I hope, if ever the privilege should be granted. it will not be reserved exclusively for the benefit of Irish Members.

Education Bill—Interval between Committee and Report Stages.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the important Amendments made in the Education Bill, at the instance of the Minister for Education himself, he will consider the advisability of giving a longer interval between the conclusion of the Committee stage and the Report stage of the Bill, in order to give a longer opportunity for giving notice of Amendments upon the latter stage.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) Unless the Session is to be prolonged I do not see how the interval between the Committee stage and the Report stage can be extended. The interval of five days is the same as that accorded by the previous Government for the Education Bill of 1902.

Government facilities for passing Local Authorities (Qualification of Women) Bill.

MR. BRODIE: To ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the Bill now before the House, entitled Local Authorities (Qualification of Women) Bill, passed its Second Reading in the last Parliament by an almost unanimous vote, and has support from all parties in the present Parliament, he will by suspension of the eleven o'clock rule, or by arranging a Saturday sitting, or in some other way, afford facilities which will give the Bill an opportunity of passing through the present Session, so that women may be qualified to serve on county, borough, and metropolitan borough councils, before the triennial county council elections next March.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The Government are very favourably disposed to this Bill, and if an opportunity offers of facilitating its progress they will gladly avail themselves of it.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Slavery in the Zanzibar Protectorate.

*MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state what steps have been taken to secure the abolition of the legal status of slavery on the mainland of the Zanzibar Protectorate.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): I would refer the hon. Member to the Answer which I gave on May 30th to a similar Question by the hon. and gallant Member for West Dorset.†

East African Timber Concession and Railway.

*MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will lay upon the Table of the House all information connected with a large timber concession in East Africa; also the terms on which the construction of a railway in connection with the said concession has been arranged, and the financial responsibility of the Government direct for the same.

MR. CHURCHILL: The timber concession referred to by the hon. Member is no doubt the leases of forests at the Eldama Ravine to Messrs. Lingham and Grogan, particulars of which are given on page 18 of the Return of Grants of Land in the East Africa Protectorate Command Paper 2902 of 1906. The question of the construction of a railway in connection with this concession is under discussion, but no agreement has yet been arrived at on the subject.

*MR. CATHCART WASON asked if there would be any financial responsibility upon this country.

MR. CHURCHILL said the railway would have to be made either from funds supplied from this country or by some private body in return for certain land concessions; but no decision had been arrived at.

*MR. CATHCART WASON: But have the Government undertaken any financial responsibility in connection with this railway?

MR. CHURCHILL said the railway itself was in a much too nebulous condition for him to say anything more. He believed the railway would be a useful and paying branch of the Uganda Railway, but no plan had yet been decided upon. No proposal had been made that the Government should construct the railway. Proposals had been made by private firms, but not decided upon.

*MR. CATHCART WASON: The concession is absolutely useless without the railway.

MR. ASHLEY: Will not this concession and railway be very useful in opening up East Africa?

MR. CHURCHILL: I think it is important for the development of East Africa, full of ripe possibilities, that the railway should be provided.

African Forests and Rainfall.

*MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware of the limited quantity of timber in East Africa, and the effect that a material diminution of the same would have on the rainfall and the climate; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State is fully aware of the importance of forest conservation in the East African Protectorate, and is arranging to send an expert to report on the question at an early date.

*MR. CATHCART WASON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this timber is more wanted in East Africa itself than in South Africa?

MR. CHURCHILL was understood to say that as the timber would be carried over the Uganda Railway he did not see that it was the duty of the Government to object to its going to South Africa.

Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's Claim against the Transvaal Government.

MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's claim, rendered in December 1901, for the use of their printing plant and machinery (Johannesburg Standard and Diggers' News), at Rissik Street, and of their jobbing and printing plant, machinery and premises in Harrison Street, Johannesburg, amounted to the sum of £9,525, full details of every item being given, and that the Transvaal authorities reduced this claim to £4,895 as equitable compensation; and can he state how this reduction was arrived at, and what were the reasons given for so reducing it.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am aware of the account from which the hon. Member is quoting: the sum of £4,895 is set down in it as estimated equitable compensation. I am not in a position to state how the reduction was arrived at.

MR. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that the equitable compensation of £4,895 credited to Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce by the Transvaal authorities in 1902 remains unpaid at the present time, and that, notwithstanding the delay and loss of interest for five years, the Colonial Office, acting on behalf of the Transvaal Government, now offers Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce a sum of £2,500 in full settlement of all demands; and can he inform the House why such an offer was made as an act of grace.

MR. CHURCHILL: The sum of £4,895 quoted in the hon. Member's question appears to have been set down in the account as an estimated amount. The sum of £2,500 which has been offered has been arrived at after careful examination locally, and the offer has been made as an act of grace because the Transvaal Government recognises no legal liability in the matter.

MR. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, if he is aware that the Harrison Street premises and jobbing and printing works and plant, belonging to Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce, and seized by the military authorities and used by them for a period of sixteen months, were let on lease to Messrs. Matthews and Walker of Johannesburg, for several years before and during the war, at a monthly rental of £250, and that since the war these premises have been unlet owing to the fact that the plant and machinery when handed over were in such bad condition as to render them practically useless, and that prior to the war the plant and machinery were valued at £18,000, and are now worth barely £2,000; and whether, when again bringing this matter to the notice of the Governor of the Transvaal, in order that Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce's reasoned protest may receive fair consideration, due emphasis will be given to the damage done to the plant and machinery during the time it was in possession of the military authorities, having regard to the fact that it was in excellent condition when taken possession of by them and is now practically useless.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State is not prepared to admit the accuracy of the statements made in this Question, which are matters of controversy; but the points raised will be brought to the notice of the Governor.

Ceylon Pearl Fisheries.

MR. COWAN (Surrey, Guildford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether all material facts connected with the negotiations for the lease of the Ceylon pearl fisheries, and the actual terms thereof, can be made public, so that the fullest information may be at the disposal of the House.

MR. CHURCHILL: I do not know of any material facts which are not included in the Blue-book which has already been laid before the House.

MR. RIDSDALE: May I ask if the prospectus of the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers was before the Colonial Office at the time it sanctioned the lease?

MR. CHURCHILL: I must ask for notice of that.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): Seeing that there is a good deal of confidential correspondence in connection with this case, may I ask how it was that while the negotiations were proceeding, a group of South African financiers who held a large number of shares——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. Notice should be given of the Question, as the facts could not be within the knowledge of the Under-Secretary, they having occurred before he was at the Colonial Office.

*SIR J. JARDINE (Roxburghshire) asked whether the late Colonial Secretary was aware that during the progress of the negotiations the Gulf syndicate sold the concession to the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers at a profit of about £11,000.

MR. CHURCHILL said he was not aware, and he regretted that the rules of the House precluded the hon. Member from asking the late Colonial Secretary, who was wholly responsible for the arrangement.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): He is always absent when the Question comes on.

*SIR J. JARDINE asked if the Under-Secretary was aware that the shares of the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers were now being sold at a premium of 1,000 per cent.

MR. CHURCHILL said he believed it was the case.

Indian Execution.

MR. BRIGHT (Oldham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, whether he has considered the explanation of the authorities of the execution of an Indian prisoner, who had appealed to the Governor-General, before there was time for the answer to the appeal to be received; and whether he proposes to take any action with regard to the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor who was responsible for this incident.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. MORLEY, Montrose, Burghs): I am in communication with the Government of India, and hope shortly to be in a position to make a detailed statement on this subject.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give any indication of the date when we may expect the statement?

MR. MORLEY: No one knows better than the hon. Member that communications with the Government of India take time. No time, however, is being lost.

Martial Law in Eastern Bengal.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that a form of martial law exists in the Mymensing district in the fact that in the business centre, or town of Muktagacha, a proclamation has been issued forbidding more than three persons to walk together in the streets without a licence; and what steps he intends taking to remove this infringement of the liberty of the people in the district named.

MR. MORLEY: I have already stated, in answer to a Question on the 21st ult.,† that in Eastern Bengal the only restrictions now in force are those imposed by the ordinary law; and that the recent rioting may have rendered special precautions necessary, within the limits allowed by the law. As to the proclamation mentioned in the Question, I have no information; but I have telegraphed inquiry.

SIR H. COTTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the rioting referred to took place fifty miles from Muktagacha?

MR. MORLEY: I am not aware of it.

MR. O'GRADY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that, in the riot cases now being tried at Mymensing, the magistrates and the Lieutenant-Governor are allowing the police to conduct the cases and are refusing counsel, and that the aggrieved parties have telegraphed to the Viceroy, who declined to interfere; and whether, in view of the possibilty of an injustice being done arising out of this departure from legal practices and precedent, he will make a personal inquiry into the matter, and take steps to assure the people of the new province that His Majesty's Government intend to insist upon the right of fair trial.

MR. MORLEY: I am not aware of the circumstances stated in the Question, but I have telegraphed for information on the subject.

MR. O'GRADY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that all this trouble is the work of a certain official, responsible for the government of the district, done on his own authority.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): Are there not regular courts original and appellate, is there not law and justice in Eastern Bengal, as in other Indian provinces?

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): Is not the poor Indian ryot utterly unable to pay legal costs?

MR. MORLEY repeated that he was awaiting the Report.

Alleged Turkish Outrages in Montenegro.

MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give any information as to the recent outrages by Turks at Baritse and other villages on the Montenegrin frontier.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): No such information has reached His Majesty's Government, but they have received a Report from His Majesty's Vice-Consul at Uskub, dated May 25th, to the effect that disturbances had broken out in the Kaza of Kalashin, on the Montenegrin frontier, caused by an attack on a body of Nizams and Albanians by Servians, and that energetic measures were being taken by the Turkish Government to restore order.

† See Col. 349.

Abyssinian Railway.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in any agreements arrived at between Great Britain and other Powers, with reference to the Abyssinian Railway, he proposes to insure that there shall be equality of economic treatment for the goods of all nations carried by the railway, and that there shall be the same equal treatment at the port of Jibuti and on the frontier of Abyssinia.

SIR EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Government are fully alive to the importance of ensuring equality of treatment on the railway for the commerce of all nations.

MR. ASHLEY: The right hon. Baronet has said nothing as to the last part of my Question.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Negotiations are still proceeding as to Jibuti and the Abyssinian frontier, and I can make no further statement now.

Turco-Egyptian Frontier.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what progress has been made by the Joint Commission in the delimitation of the Turco-Egyptian frontier.

SIR EDWARD GREY: We understand that satisfactory progress is being made on the spot with the delimitation of the Turco-Egyptian frontier, and it is hoped that the map of the frontier will be finished soon.

Denshawi Trial.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a public and full record exists of the evidence given during the recent trial at Denshawi; and, if so, where it may be consulted or whence a copy may be obtained.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have asked to be supplied with the evidence given before the Special Tribunal, but it will be necessary to have it translated before it can be laid before the House.

Murder of Missionaries at Nan-Chang.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the British claim against the Chinese Government, in connection with the murder of missionaries at Nan-chang, has been settled; and, if so, whether the terms are such as will tend to safeguard the lives and property of British missionaries in China in the future.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Terms of settlement have been arrived at as to the punishments of the responsible officials and rioters which are considered satisfactory, and His Majesty's Chargé d' Affaires has been authorised to inform the Chinese Government that the matter will be regarded as settled conditionally on the payment of an indemnity to the surviving child of Mr. and Mrs. Kingham, and for the property destroyed, and of rewards for Chinese officials who assisted British missionaries. It is hoped that the punishments given will be a safeguard against such catastrophes in future.

Cretan Administration.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the International Commission, constituted in February last to examine the causes of the disturbances during last year in Crete, and to report on reforms to be introduced into the Cretan regime has formulated the results of its inquiries; and whether it may be expected that an announcement will be made shortly in regard to the future government of the island.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The International Commission made extensive recommendations as to administrative and economic reforms which are likely to receive the assent of the Powers concerned at an early date. When they are agreed on the steps to be taken the result will of course be made known.

Mr. LONSDALE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these delays are likely to lead to further disturbances? Crete has been for a long time in a more or less disturbed state.

Sir EDWARD GREY: The Government are quite aware of that, and the discussions are proceeding with a view to arriving at a decision as soon as possible.

Local Commissioners of Taxes.

Mr. SEARS (Cheltenham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the legal or other authority under which the Board of Inland Revenue controls the Local Commissioners of Taxes and their clerks, including also the parochial assessors and collectors which the commissioners have power to appoint; and what remedy the board have in case of neglect, delay, or disregard of instructions.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Asquith, Fifeshire, E.): The relations between the Board of Inland Revenue on the one hand, and the Local Commissioners of Taxes on the other, are governed generally by the Income Tax Act, 1842, and the Board's relations to the clerks and other officers of the Commissioners by the Taxes Management Act of 1880. Cases of neglect, delay, or disregard of instructions are not under the provisions of these Acts applicable to the particular circumstances of each case.

Tax Collection.

Mr. SEARS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that assessment forms are issued to the public from the parochial assessor's office, notice of assessment from the office of the clerk to the local commissioners, and notice to pay from the office of the parochial collector; that the collector of Inland Revenue issues his pay notices from the Government office; that from the office of surveyor of taxes communications regularly pass between him and the public, and from the same office uncollected arrears left by the parochial collector are dealt with; will he consider whether it is necessary to have in the same city or town five distinct offices for dealing with taxpayers; and will he cause inquiries to be made of outside officials as to the confusion which results from this multiplication of offices.

Mr. ASQUITH: The facts are substantially as represented in the first eight lines of the Question. The Board of Inland Revenue consider that the present arrangements are the most convenient and appropriate for the proper discharge of the duties to be undertaken, and they are not themselves aware of any confusion that results from them.

Fictitious Brandy.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state what precautions the Customs take to enforce the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act as regards brandy; what check there is against the use of false trade descriptions; if any test is applied, and what is it, to ascertain whether spirit entered as brandy is derived from the grape or from materials other than the grape; how many gallons of spirit imported from Hamburg were admitted to entry last year as brandy; was such spirit the distillate of the grape; how many seizures were made last year of brandy to which a false trade description was applied under the Merchandise Marks Act; what was the quantity of brandy as per Customs entries from Norway, Holland, and Denmark for the last ten years; and is it the case that at London Docks any spirit, whatever its origin, shipped as brandy is so entered by Customs and dock officials.

Mr. ASQUITH: The means taken by the officers of Customs to prevent imported spirits being falsely described as brandy, in contravention of the Merchandise Marks Acts, are to examine all spirits entered as brandy, and, if such do not appear to be the brandy of commerce, to submit samples to the departmental analyst. No test is applied to ascertain whether spirit entered as brandy is derived from the grape or from other materials, but tests are applied to ascertain whether such spirits contain those constituents other than spirit which characterise the brandy of commerce. If such constituents are not present the spirit is not allowed to be entered as brandy. Particulars of the quantity of brandy imported from Hamburg are not available, the records of imports being shown under countries only. During the year 1905 two consignments of spirits described as brandy were seized under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, for having a false trade description applied. The quantity of brandy imported into the United Kingdom from Norway, Holland, and Denmark during the last ten years was as follows:—

Years.	Norway.		Netherlands.		Denmark.
		Proof Gallons.		Proof Gallons.		Proof Gallons.
1896		3,032		34,012		9,481
1897		66		35,756		26,442
1898		2		22,066		11,142
1899		641		24,330		23,053
1900		6,363		22,446		2,824
1901		3,342		17,410		1,186
1902		3,164		14,521		1,688
1903		4,599		8,276		32
1904	Imported	294	Imported	7,033	Imported	32
	Consigned	292	Consigned	3,564	Consigned	32
190	Imported	1,928	Imported	5,947	Imported	61
	Consigned	1,928	Consigned	2,320	Consigned	61

As will be seen form what is stated above, it is not the case that at the London Docks or elsewhere any spirit, whatever its origin, shipped as brandy is allowed by the Customs Department to be entered as brandy. The Board have no official knowledge as to the action of the dock officials with regard to such spirits.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why allow brandy to be imported from countries in which notoriously no grapes are grown?

MR. ASQUITH: It may be in course of transit from elsewhere.

Motor 'Bus Accidents in London Streets.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY (Paddington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the death of Mr. William Tongue and the injury of the Reverend Alfred Littlehales through a collision between two motor omnibuses in the Edgware Road on Wednesday, June 20th; if he is aware that these vehicles are constantly causing injury to the persons and property of the public; and if he can see his way to revise all existing licences in respect of these vehicles to insure that they are properly constructed and driven by competent and experienced men, who are not paid by the journey.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): My attention has been called to the unfortunate occurrence referred to. The verdict at the inquest on Mr. Tongue was "accidental death." Every precaution within the powers of the police is taken to secure that motor omnibuses are properly constructed and that they are driven by competent men. In the event of a motor 'bus becoming unfit for use, or of an offence being committed by the driver, the licences come under consideration, and I see no reason for a general revision, even if it were within my power to require it. The police have no authority to prescribe the terms of employment of the drivers.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are four or five competing companies on that road, who are always "nursing" and racing, and will he instruct the police to put a stop to it?

*MR. GLADSTONE: The police have general instructions as to this.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked if the Home Secretary was aware that the danger from this traffic was on the increase.

*MR. GLADSTONE replied that no doubt every Member of the House had observed the undue speed of these cars, but the question was under the consideration of the Select Committee and the Royal Commission, and until these two bodies reported they would not have full information on the subject.

MR. FLYNN: Can the Home Office do nothing until a Cabinet Minister has been killed?

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am not sure we can do anything even then.

The Charlottenburg Exhibition.

MR. ALDEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware of the fact that the German Government has established and maintains at Charlottenburg a permanent exhibition of appliances designed to prevent accidents and to safeguard the welfare of workmen; that similar institutions exist at Munich, Amsterdam, Brussels, and Zurich; and whether, under the circumstances, he will consider the advisability of establishing or assisting in the formation of a similar institution in England.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am aware that several institutions of the kind mentioned in the Question are in existence on the Continent. The question of establishing a similar institution in this country has been several times discussed, but there are considerable practical difficulties to be overcome. I may say that a good deal of useful work has been done in this country in another way to spread information as to the best methods of fencing and the like, that is, by the publication of special reports on particular classes of machinery—the reports on Cotton Cloth Machinery and Hoists and Teagles may be specially mentioned. I am now making further inquiries and I will communicate with my hon. friend.

Steel Trade Rings.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the details of the agreements which have been arrived at by British steel manufacturers with reference to steel plates and steel rails respectively; if he is aware of the rise in price of these materials which has taken place since the agreements were arrived at; that a third combination to raise prices has just been formed in the steel angle trade; and if he can promise to introduce legislation on the subject at an early date.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I am unable to give the details of the agreement to which the hon. Member refers, but I have heard it stated that they include an obligation on the part of Scottish and North of England makers of steel plates not to sell certain classes of goods in each others' markets. A provisional agreement of a similar nature is believed to have been entered into with regard to angles, but I am not aware whether it has been ratified yet. As regards steel rails, there has for a long time been an agreement among the principal British makers, who are also understood to be parties to an arrangement arrived at by an international rail syndicate for the division of the world's markets. I am aware of the rise in price which has occurred, but I am advised that this is partly due to other causes affecting the steel market generally. Arrangements for maintaining prices exist in a number of other trades in the United Kingdom, and the introduction of legislative measures for dealing with the matter would obviously require very careful consideration.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would give special attention to the bearing of this matter upon international trade, in view of the fact that these international agreements were in restraint of competition.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Certainly. My attention has already been called to the international aspect of the matter, more especially with regard to South American rails.

New York Mutual Reserve Company.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company, of New York, have given up their offices at 79, Cannon Street, London; can he state what sum was lodged by this company with the Board of Trade as security for the policy-holders; whether any, and, if so, what part of this sum has been withdrawn; and on what grounds was such withdrawal allowed by the Board of Trade; and can he say what security, if any, has been left for policy holders.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am informed that the Company in question have given up their London office. The sum of £20,000, as required by the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, was deposited with the Court of Chancery by the company when commencing their business in this country in 1886, but the amount was withdrawn by order of the Court in January last in accordance with the Act which provides for the repayment of the deposit as soon as a company has accumulated out of premiums the sum of £40,000. The Board of Trade are not aware of the nature of the security for policy-holders in this or any other insurance companies.

MR. FLYNN: Were the Inspectors of the Board of Trade aware that this company's system was actuarially unsound from the very beginning, and did the Board of Trade take any steps with regard to it?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Lest the public should be under any delusion on the subject, I may say that the Board of Trade is not responsible in connection with the soundness of a company. We do not audit their accounts. The whole question is now being considered by a Committee of the House of Lords.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did the Board of Trade get notice of the withdrawal of the money from the Court of Chancery?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will inquire.

MR. BOLAND: Will the right hon. Gentleman see that the particulars of this case are laid before the House of Lords' Committee?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes; if my right hon. friend will bring the facts to my notice I will certainly see that the House of Lords' Committee has the information.

London Improvements—House Demolition.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been directed to a notice, advertised in daily and other newspapers circulated in London, of an application to the justices in quarter sessions, to be heard on Tuesday next, for an order to stop sixteen streets so far as some 4,800 feet of such streets are unnecessary by reason of certain building schemes; whether he is aware that it is elsewhere alleged that by such schemes there will afterwards be opened other streets which will more than compensate the public; whether the Local Government Board have any means of forming an opinion as to the nature of the working population likely to be displaced, and as to the possibility of housing such population in the neighbourhood; whether during the two years which is estimated as likely to pass before the houses on six acres of the property in question are pulled down, the President of the Local Government Board would offer the good offices of himself or his department with a view of conferring with those interested in order to make some provision for re-housing the population affected.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): I have made inquiry on this subject, and I understand the facts to be as stated. I have no definite information as to the nature of the working population displaced, but I should anticipate that there would be difficulty in housing now the population in the neighbourhood. I find that the Chelsea Borough Council have for some time been in communication with the promoters of the scheme with regard to the persons of the working class who will be displaced, and that they have obtained some concessions, but not altogether what they desired. They have not, however, succeeded in inducing the promoters to undertake to provide housing accommodation for the persons displaced, but they have obtained some extension of the period of displacement. I do not think I could expect to be more successful if I acted on the suggestion made in the last part of the Question, but I will consider what can be done.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government have considered the possibility of legislation to restrict the destruction of more than a certain area of town property below a certain average rateable value without the submission of schemes showing possible provision for the accommodation of those rendered houseless in extension of the legislation which imposes such obligations on those asking for Parliamentary powers.

MR. JOHN BURNS: Proposals of this kind have from time to time been considered by the Local Government Board, but they have not seen their way to proposing legislation on the subject. I will, however, take notice of the suggestion of my right hon. friend.

Education Bill—Extended Facilities.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether schools which shall be given extended facilities, and the owners of which are to receive no rent, will be maintained and kept in repair by the Education Department; and, if so, what the term "other payment" refers to in the Amendment which was carried in regard to the question of rent.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The responsibility will rest with the local education authority, not with the Board. The term "other payment" is inserted to cover the possible case of extended facilities being afforded in respect of a schoolhouse which is purchased by a local education authority and is in consequence the schoolhouse of a transferred voluntary school as defined by Clause 13 of the Bill.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that there was a widespread feeling of the injustice of this proposal to pay no rent for these schools, and whether on report he would reconsider this question.

MR. BIRRELL: I am afraid I cannot go back on the decision of the Committee.

State-Aided Schools.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if the State-aided schools, established by Clause 4 of the Education Bill, will be regarded as public elementary schools.

MR. BIRRELL: I must refer the hon. Member to the Answer I gave on Thursday last to the Member for Chorley,† to which I have nothing to add.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): The effect of that Answer was that the right hon. Gentleman had not made up his mind.

MR. BIRRELL: I do not think they are public elementary schools.

House of Commons' Letter-Boxes.

MR. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if his attention has been drawn to the absence of contrivances on the fixed letter-boxes in the precincts of this House to indicate the time of the next collection of the missives deposited therein; and whether he will take steps to remedy this deficiency.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): My attention has been drawn to this matter, and I am having indicators brought into use.

Collection of Crown Rents—Messrs. Clutton's Fees.

MR. NUSSEY (Pontrefact): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury on what terms Messrs. Clutton are employed by the Woods and Forests Commissioners, and what was their total remuneration in 1903, 1904, and 1905 respectively, from every source in connection with the properties, premises, etc., under the control of the Commissioners.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): Messrs. Clutton are appointed receivers of the Crown rents and profits arising within the Southern and Midland Counties of England (other than London and Middlesex), and are entitled to retain a poundage of 3 per cent. in the case of some estates and 4 per cent. in the case of others on the amount of rents, etc., collected by them, except on receipts from farms in hand, for the superintendence of which fixed fees agreed with the Treasury are allowed in lieu of commission. Out of this commission and fees they have to provide their own offices and necessary staff, and pay their own travelling and other expenses. They are also usually employed by the Commissioners of Woods as surveyors in matters arising within the districts for which they are receivers, and in which the services of surveyors are required. For these services they are paid charges and expenses in accordance with a scale sanctioned by the Treasury.

Their total remuneration for the years 1903, 1904, and 1905, is as follows, viz. :—

Year.	£	s.	d.

Scottish Education System.

Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can meet the requests made to him on the Education Estimates, to print and circulate a Bill to meet the requirements of the Scottish educational system before the rising of Parliament.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): My hon. friend's suggestion has been carefully considered, and I regret to say that it cannot be followed. It seems the duty of the Government in the first place to endeavour to dispose of the Bills referring to Scotland which are already before the House, or have been promised.

Sutherland Deer Forests.

Mr. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that within the last twelve months three homesteads have been broken up near Kinbrace, Sutherland, comprising over 1,000 acres, the houses on two of them blown up by dynamite; and the farms, nearly one-third of which was arable land, turned into a deer forest; and whether the Government intend to take steps to prevent such clearances in future.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The information the hon. Member has received appears to be incorrect. I am informed the facts are as follows: Lochside Farm, to which the Question presumably refers, extends to an area of 4,890 acres or thereby, only 320 of which are arable, or at one time meant to be arable. These 320 acres formed part of what is known as the late Duke of Sutherland's "Kinbrace Reclamations," and the cost of reclaiming that portion alone was about £20,000. It was intended to be divided into three farms with hill pasture common to the three, and concrete houses and offices were erected. But tenants for the three holdings could not be got, and the land was then let as one holding. The arable proved ruinous to the tenant who took it. The nature of the land, situation, and climate were unsuitable to profitable cultivation. The arable land was all put down to grass. In 1886 another attempt was made to let the place in three holdings, but tenants were not forthcoming. The farm was then let on lease for nineteen years as a small sheep farm. The tenant to whom it was let retained it till Whitsunday, 1897, when he was allowed to assign the lease to a tenant occupying two other farms on the estate. The lease expired at Whitsunday, 1905, and it was not considered desirable to re let it to the same tenant, and it was let on long lease to the gentleman who, for a number of years, occupied the shooting over that and adjoining farms. Only one of the houses which had been erected has been occupied for many years and that by a shepherd, the two others being wrecks, their construction proving unsuitable for the district. They were unfit for habitation and were taken down. The shepherd remained in the other house till he obtained another situation. This particular case seems to have been an unsuccessful effort to reclaim land for cultivation, and not a clearance. In regard to legislation, I am unable to make any further statement until the Government Bill to amend the Crofters' Act has been introduced.

Mr. MORTON: Is it the fact that the houses were blown up with dynamite?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I will furnish the hon. Member with a full statement of the facts given to me.

Mr. MORTON: But is it correct that the houses were blown up with dynamite?

MR. SINCLAIR: The houses were not occupied.

MR. MORTON: Then they were blown up with dynamite?

MR. SINCLAIR: I have no information as to that occurrence.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Were they blown down by dynamite?

Scottish Medical Officers' Holdings.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been directed to the fact that the Scottish Local Government Board reported recently that it would be to the advantage of the public service that parish councils should grant an adequate holiday to their medical officers, defraying at the same time the cost of a substitute to act for the doctor during his absence; if the Local Government Board have circularised parish councils to that effect; and whether, in view of the poverty of certain districts and burden of local rates rising to over 20s. in the pound, he will take all the circumstances into his earnest consideration.

MR. SINCLAIR: On July 25th, 1900, the Local Government Board issued a circular on this subject generally favourable to the arrangement indicated. The whole question of rating is engaging my earnest consideration.

Glasnevin Model Farm.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): On behalf of the hon. Member for North Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that recently the public have been excluded from the right of walking through the grounds of the model farm, Glasnevin, county Dublin, through which they have been accustomed to go since the opening of the farm many years ago without let or hindrance and without complaint on the part of the authorities in charge; whether the exclusion of the public has followed closely upon the erection on the farm of some private residences for some officials; and whether, if no injury has in the past ensued as a consequence of the admission of the public to the grounds, the recent order will be revoked.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Department of Agriculture have recently had the public excluded from the grounds of the Albert Agricultural College and Model Farm on Sundays. On week days these grounds have been open as heretofore, but it is intended soon to issue regulations with regard to the admission of the public during the week. The Department's action has no connection whatever with the extensions which have recently been carried out in the buildings, which include a residence for one of the officials. The decision to regulate the admission of the public has been arrived at in view of the fact that it is incompatible with the proper arrangement of the studies and discipline of such an institution if these premises and grounds were to be accessible to the public without any restriction.

Chicago Tinned Meat.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a suppressed Report of one of the Chicago yard inspectors, on which President Roosevelt acted, declared that of one lot of 500 cattle, slaughtered and exported in tins, 300 were tuberculous; and whether seeing that scientific experts have declared that boiling does not destroy the germs of consumption in tuberculous meat, the Government will prohibit the import of tinned meat till it is an established fact that no tuberculous beast will be allowed into the packing yards of Chicago and the other centres from which tinned meat is exported.

MR. BRYCE: I have no information upon the subject of the Question, but I would refer to the reply given by my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board to a Question put by the hon. Member for the Newark Division on June 18th,† from which the hon. Member will see that the Government are considering the necessity of obtaining further powers for dealing with foods imported from abroad.

Constabulary Fund.

Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say if the total sum standing to the credit of the Constabulary Force Fund on March 31st last was £386,220; and whether he will recommend that the damages, £100, obtained by Edward Carroll, Rosenallis, Queen's County, in the High Courts a year ago, against constables Masterson and Cryan, Royal Irish Constabulary, for assault, shall be paid out of the said fund, as the constables have so far evaded payment.

Mr. BRYCE: The amount of stock and cash to the credit of the benefit branch of the Constabulary Force Fund is as stated. The fund is, under Statute and Treasury regulation, applicable only to payments to the widows and families of deceased members of the force who were subscribers to the fund; and it could not, therefore, be legally applied to the purpose suggested in the Question.

Galway Evicted Tenant.

Mr. JOHN ROCHE (Galway E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that an evicted tenant named William O'Neill was promised £100 to stock a farm which he got at New Inn, county Galway; whether he can state the amount he received; and will he direct that the balance will be paid him without further delay.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they sanctioned free grants of £130 for building and £45 for stock to William O'Neill, an evicted tenant, to whom they allotted a parcel of land. Up to the end of last month the entire grant for stock had been issued, and all but £20 of the grant for building. The inspector, under whose supervision the building grant is being expended, has now been directed to make such further payments as the work done justifies.

Commission on Drainage.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any interim Report has been made, or will be called for, from the Commission on Drainage; and, if so, when it may be expected.

Mr. BRYCE: The Commissioners do not propose to present an interim Report, but they anticipate that they will be able to furnish their complete Report by the close of the present year. It does not appear that the object for which the Commission was appointed would be furthered in any way by the presentation of an interim Report.

Louth Evicted Tenant.

Mr. NOLAN (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recent eviction of Michael Duffy, of Roodstown, Ardee Union, county Louth, by the Earl of Dartrey, for non-payment of a rack-rent; whether he is aware that the tenant was unable to enter the Land Court to have a fair rent fixed, owing to arrears of rent of twenty-five years' standing, with subsequent law costs; that the eviction has been condemned by resolution by the Ardree Board of Guardians; and whether he can hold out any hope of a speedy restoration of Mr. Duffy to his holding.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have no knowledge of the matters of fact alleged in the Question, and that Michael Duffy has not lodged with them an application for reinstatement. Should such application be made to the Commissioners they will have it duly enquired into and dealt with.

Sweating.

Mr. O'GRADY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that in the East End of London there are approximately 5,000 employers, employing approximately 90,000 workpeople, who can be classed as sweaters and sweated, and that the same condition of things applies relatively to all the large centres of industry, he will consider the advisability of appointing a Royal Commission to investigate the sweating evils, with the view of recommending legislation that will remedy the matter.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Stirling Burghs):

I have already told the hon. Gentleman that the Government do not at present propose to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the sweating system. He must not think that we are indifferent or unsympathetic in regard to the evils of this system, which we recognise as fully as he does. I may tell him that all the steps that can be taken within the existing law to protect the workers from the bad economic and sanitary conditions that beset them are being taken: and the Central Departments which are concerned with the admistration of the Factory and Sanitary Acts are collecting, informating, and putting pressure upon the local authorities to carry out their duties.

MR. O'GRADY asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that, after all, the greatest pressure came from wages as well as from sanitation, that the law could not interfere with that matter, and that, therefore, it did require a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter of wages as well as of sanitation.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN was understood to reply that the time might come when it might be necessary to make an inquiry, but that the Government did not think it had arisen yet. They had many inquiries already on hand.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY asked whether, in view of the importance of the wages side of this question, the right hon. Gentleman could facilitate the Wages Bill now before the House, or bring forward a similar measure as a Government measure.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is asking me for special facilities for a particular Bill. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will repeat his Question at a later date.

Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Bill.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow. Camlachie): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a whip or letter of solicitation, issued last week by an officer of the Board of Agriculture, and dated from the offices of the Board of Agriculture, to Members of this House sitting on the Grand Committee on Law, begging support for a Bill of that Department called the Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Bill, in which it was stated that this official was acting on the orders of Lord Carrington and expressing his wishes; whether it is in accordance with custom for officials in the public State Departments to issue whips to Members of this House; and, if not, whether he will consider the advisability of issuing a Minute directing public officials not to bring pressure to bear on Members of the House of Commons.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not see that there is anything coercive or that any undue interference or pressure has been exercised in the letter referred to, a copy of which I have seen. A Minister is entitled, whether by letter or by speech, to urge the importance of a departmental measure for which he is responsible. And, on the other hand, I have no doubt that those engaged in the trade of fertilisers and feeding stuffs will take such means as they think suitable for furthering their views.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman think it makes no difference if the Minister is a Member of the House of Lords and the members of the Committee are Members of the House of Commons?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: He does not address the Members of the House of Commons directly. He does it through his Department or through the hon. Member who represents him in this House as a rule.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, without commenting on the propriety of the step, whether it is not a very unusual step, and whether the ordinary conditions of traditional practice are not far better and far safer for Ministers to follow?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not how what the right hon. Gentleman refers to as the traditional practice. I should think that a Minister might very well use such means as he has for bringing before the Members of the Committee the importance of the subject.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether I shall be in order if I address members of a Committee of the House of Lords ?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Perfectly, I should say—for what it is worth.

The Education Bill.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the President of the Board of Education whether he would arrange to have the Education Bill reprinted so that they might have Clause 4 before them in its present shape, and, also, how he proposed to ascertain the wishes of the House in respect of the new Clause 3 before they reached Clause 8 ?

MR. BIRRELL thought it would be very convenient to have a reprint of the Bill, and he would issue orders accordingly. He quite agreed that the new clause stood in a somewhat difficult position. Clause 8 would come on, in ordinary course, to-morrow, and he apprehended that it must be discussed as it stood now upon the Paper. The new clause was introduced because he held the view, perhaps mistakenly, that he was under some obligation, in consequence of what took place in the House, to give a choice in the matter. It was in consequence of the feeling expressed on the other side.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby) : This side.

MR. BIRRELL : Then on both sides if you will. I repeat that it was not the Government proposal. Their proposals were as stated in the Bill. A proposal was made by the hon. Member for the University of Oxford that there should be an obligation imposed upon every local education authority to take over every structurally fit school that proposed itself to be taken over. He said that, in his opinion, that ought to be a bi-lateral obligation, and that there should be an obligation on the part of private owners and also of trustees, even although their trusts were what were called of a loose character—trusts which permitted their premises to be applied to non-educational purposes—that they should be taken over too. That proposal was certainly not accepted by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and if he had had the experience he now had of the conduct of measures he would probably have thought it the wiser thing to let the matter drop. But, being anxious to afford facilities for that discussion, he said he would introduce a clause. He did not think it would be fair, however, that he should use the Government majority to compel private owners compulsorily to part with their schools unless it was generally felt that that was a desirable course. Therefore, unless he got some sort of indication—it was very difficult to know to whom he was to look for it—that the clause received some measure of general support, he did not think the Government would persist with it. Although he could not put compulsion on anybody, and right hon. Gentlemen opposite were fully entitled to stand on their dignity and say the Government must take its own course, he did think it would be convenient to know what was the view taken of this clause, which was introduced to meet a point by hon. Gentlemen opposite. If it was accepted, Clause 8 would have to be debated in a modified form, but in the absence of any assurance they must go on with Clause 8 as it stood.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether the point which the right hon. Gentleman said the clause was introduced to meet was a pledge given by the Government on the introduction of the Bill that facilities should be given in schools under Clause 3, and whether that was a point which could be ignored by the Government.

MR. BIRRELL said he disputed that altogether. He had read over again the speech he made on that occasion, and he said most unhesitatingly that there was no obligation, expressed or implied, in any part of that speech, on the local authority to take over those schools. He thought he made that perfectly clear as to Clause 3. He invariably used the hypothetical expression "if" the school was transferred, and "if so" again and again. He was not there to defend the precision of his language, and it might very well be that ingenious minds might put another construction upon certain passages. He could not for one moment admit that there was a single word fairly read in his speech, taking the context altogether, which expressed the faintest intention on the part of the Government to impose on every local authority in the country the obligation of taking over voluntary schools, whether they were wanted or not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was correctly reported to have said:—"Thus far the facilities or opportunities I have spoken of have been of a compulsory character"—speaking of Clause 3. "When demanded and when required, the authorities must grant them."

MR. BIRRELL said that was the one passage in the whole speech which was ambiguous in its terms. He fully expected to hear it quoted. There were other passages which made it perfectly plain that he contemplated no obligation, and that very likely the schools would not be transferred under that clause.

MR. DILLON said that on the strength of the Government pledge an Amendment moved from the Liberal benches was withdrawn.

MAJOR SEELY said he moved the Amendment in question, and after his right hon. friend had given the pledge in very specific terms, he withdrew the Amendment on the advice of the hon. Member for Waterford and against the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The account given by his right hon. friend seemed to him totally at variance with the facts.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) asked whether there was any Question before the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: We are still at Question time; perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will remember that.

MR. BIRRELL apologised for having exceeded the limits of an Answer to a Question. He was quite willing that the new clause should come on for discussion on the Report stage, if it was wanted. But he still thought he was fairly entitled to ascertain whether the clause was wanted by the House, and he must proceed with Clause 8 on the assumption that the new clause was not wanted.

MR. DILLON asked whether it was not the custom, when the Government gave a pledge to introduce a clause, that they should introduce it in accordance with the pledge.

MR. PAUL (Northampton) hoped his right hon. friend would do nothing to interfere with the burning desire of the Church of England schools for confiscation.

MESSAGE TO THE LORDS.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords to request that their Lordships will be pleased to give leave to Sir Henry Graham, K.C.B., Clerk of the Parliaments, to attend to be examined as a Witness before the Committee of Public Accounts.—(Mr. Victor Cavendish.)

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.

Order [June 15th] that the Bills of Exchange Act (1882) Amendment Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, etc., read, and discharged.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc.—(Mr. Attorney-General.)

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[MR. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 7:—

*MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury), in moving to omit Sub-section (1), said he believed he was echoing the sentiments of all people who valued religious denominational instruction when he said that the facilities for instruction on two days in the week given under Clause 3 would be only a sham, unless the religious instruction was allowed to be given by teachers who believed in that particular denominational instruction which the owners of the schools and the parents of children attending the schools wished o have taught there. He would be told that the teacher was not the person to give it, but that it was the duty of the ministers of the various denominations. He frankly admitted that some ministers were perfectly qualified to give the instuction, but all teachers were not born ministers of religion, and all ministers of religion were not born teachers. It was generally admitted that to impart secular instruction a teacher had to undergo a careful course of training and to possess the ability to impart instruction and to control children. If those qualities were necessary in order to give secular instruction, he thought they must admit that persons who had to give denominational instruction should also possess them. He anticipated that he should have the support of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education, for hon. Members would remember his exceedingly eloquent and telling speech of May 22nd on the Amendment, the object of which was to drive all religious instruction from the day school, when he said that the national teachers were becoming more skilled every day, and knew the way to a child's mind better than anyone else, and asked what the child would have to look to if the teacher did not help it. From that he (Mr. Hicks Beach) thought he might infer that, if the teacher were to be allowed to give undenominational teaching, he ought surely to be allowed to give denominational teaching as well. He believed he should also have the support of the Government, because by their Bill, as it at present stood, they admitted the principle that the teacher was a person who ought to give religious instruction, whether of an undenominational character, or whether of that particular kind which was allowed in schools of urban areas in five days in the week. The Minister for Education, in reply to a deputation of representatives of the Jewish schools, went so far as to announce his intention with reference to Clause 4, that the schools should be carried on just as they were now, and that it was certainly the intention of the clause that the teachers should remain the same as they were. If children in schools in urban areas were to be allowed the privilege of being taught by the teachers in religious subjects on five days of the week, was it not rather a slur on the children in rural schools that they were not also to be allowed that privilege? The Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Education also asked the Committee to look at this subject, not from the standpoint of the House of Commons but from the standpoint of the child; and said the child would find there was something wanting if the teacher was not allowed to give him religious as well as secular instruction. He believed there would also be something wanting if the teacher was allowed to give the child undenominational teaching for three days a week and was not allowed to give him denominational teaching on two days a week. Naturally a child would ask why was it that his teacher was allowed to teach him certain things three days a week and not to give him instruction on the other days? He would ask whether his teacher really believed in the doctrines which he was not allowed to impart to him. The teacher would have to reply that he believed in them, but that owing to the extreme foresight of the great Liberal Party, who had always boasted about religious equality, he was not permitted to afford the religious instruction desired. He did not know what the child would think upon receiving that answer, but he could only hope that one result would be to make an impression upon the child's mind which would lead him when he grew up to never vote for any Liberal candidate. He believed that the teachers valued the privilege of giving this religious instruction as much as any part of their duties, and were by no means anxious to give it up. No doubt he should be told that the Government had received a mandate to abolish tests for teachers, and that under the existing system Nonconformist teachers were cut off from appointments in Church schools; but he would have more respect for that cry if it were not a fact that the best paid posts were to be found in the provided schools, and if he did not believe that there were not sufficient Nonconformist teachers to fill up the posts of head teacher in the provided schools without saying anything of those posts in the non-provided schools. He believed, moreover, that this Clause 7 was nothing more nor less than another flank attack upon the Church of England. The President of the Board of Education had said that the minority must suffer, but he believed that the result of this clause would be that the majority would suffer and the minority would benefit. He believed that this was an attack upon the Church of England, because under Clause 4 100 per cent. of the Jewish schools would be enabled to give their own religious instruction through the teachers, and 77 per cent. of the Roman Catholic schools would be in the same position, while only 25 per cent. of the Church of England schools would be saved for the purposes designed by their founders. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 13, to leave out Sub-section (1)."—(Mr. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'a teacher employed in a public elementary school' stand part of the clause."

*MR. ACLAND (Yorkshire, Richmond) said this was one of the most important points of the Bill. The Committee would doubtless be told that what was desired by the Amendment was simply freedom to teach, and that it was illiberal to refuse freedom of any kind. But he thought the sub-section as it stood made for a more important freedom, the freedom to be really free. If it was omitted they must say good-bye altogether to the idea that they were getting rid of tests for teachers. In the county, part of which he represented, they had, as it happened, as chairman of the committee charged with the appointment of teachers an archdeacon of the Church of England, a most fair-minded man, who would do his duty in selecting teachers to the best of his ability; but it would, in his opinion, only be that man's duty to see to it, if the Amendment were carried, that there were sent to Church schools only such teachers as would be willing to give Church of England instruction. That would be so in a large number of counties, and if it were not done by the education authority it would be the duty of the clergyman of the parish concerned to do everything he could to see that the same action was taken. He would get to see the records of all the candidates for the post of teacher, he would find out which of them would give the denominational teaching, and he would make it quite clear that one of these must be appointed, if peace and quietness in the village were desired. They had gone a very long way in meeting particular cases with regard to denominational teachers. The Catholic case was a very special and peculiar one, demanding special treatment. But they were not willing to go one inch further than they had gone already in the direction of letting religious questions interfere with the appointment of teachers. Let them consider what would happen in the case of a teacher who had hitherto given religious instruction and was willing to continue it after the passing of the Act. He would of course receive a special salary, and would naturally desire that all children should receive the instruction, because it would be impossible in a small school to give both denominational and Cowper-Temple instruction at the same time. He would succeed in making all the parents apply for the special teaching, and on two days of the week the other teaching would disappear. A man might then come to the village wishing for the Cowper-Temple instruction, which he had a perfect right to demand for his children. The teacher who had settled down to give denominational instruction would find that he was put to a great deal of inconvenience and financial loss, and would find the presence of the newcomer very inconvenient, and would make his life or that of his children difficult. Then there was the case of a teacher who had been appointed without inquiry beforehand as to his religion, and who was not willing to give denominational teaching. It would be a very hard thing for such a teacher, who would find him or herself opposed to the predominant power in the village, and it would be very difficult to settle down happily there. The only possible course was to say that the teacher must serve one master only. He might do exactly what he liked out of school hours in regard to instruction, but during the school hours he was the servant of the education authority only, and not of any sect or denomination. People charged the Bill with doing nothing for education, but there were really plenty of places where it made for educational progress—though it was true you had to look for them. The sub-section as it stood ought to make for educational improvement. The condition of things in the scattered schools in the rural counties hitherto had made for stagnation. There was too much stagnation in the schools, and that was not right. A good secretary of the education authority under this Bill, with power for the first time to review and make all appointments and promotions, would be able to organise the teaching in the villages and put it on a much better footing. He would be able to take a promising assistant teacher in a large school and give him the position of head teacher in a small village school, with a promise that if he succeeded there as a head teacher he would promote him to a larger school. Putting good teachers into these small village schools was the best way of keeping the schools up to the mark. But all this would be made much more difficult if the Amendment was adopted. He thought all the educational development for which they hoped would be effected by making the educational question the only question to be considered in making these appointments. It would be a very bad thing for a teacher to be labelled as a persona grata or a persona ingrata in High Church schools, because such a thing was likely to interfere with the educational requirements of the staffing of the schools. He also put it on the ground of religion. He thought very strongly that it was in the true interest of religion that the Church of England and other Churches should realise from the first that they were going to be put in a different position, in some ways at any rate, by this Bill; that they should organise their teachers and make their arrangements from the first, the time most suitable for so doing. They would soon have offered to them certain rents for the use of buildings, and that would be one use for them. The great Churches could organise a splendid system of visiting and resident teachers to give proper denominational teaching if they began when these rents were first paid, and did not allow them to be absorbed for some other purpose. They ought also to consider the recent offer of 75 per cent. of building grants to all public training colleges. If that meant anything it meant that many teachers' training colleges would be built, and many teachers turned out from those training colleges who would have no guarantee of any special fitness to give denominational instruction. The proportion of trained teachers in the English Church schools must therefore decrease. Any authority which had to staff these schools would be bound more and more to staff them with teachers who were unable or unwilling to give denominational teaching. Was it not better that the Church should face the state of things and organise a proper system of teachers for denominational instruction with the funds available for that purpose? It was amazing to see the lightness of heart with which any teacher trained in any Church Training College was entrusted with the special and delicate task of giving denominational teaching. If such teaching was given it should be given by a man who had had a great deal more special training than was afforded by two years residence in a training college, the whole of which time was occupied in studying for the examinations in secular subjects by which he passed out of the college. Then there was one final argument; they were told the teachers desired to give this special religious instruction. He admitted that a great many of them did, for two very considerable reasons. In the first place, there was the well-known hatred of any outside interference, which they very much disliked, and which they brutally described as "the parson in their school." They were disturbed by what they thought would be the introduction of an outside element in their school, and naturally they desired to keep their school to themselves. That was the first reason why they were anxious to give this teaching in the future. The second was that they would get extra salary for so doing. They were, therefore, a class who would agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite, if any class would, that his Amendment ought to be adopted. But what was the opinion which they found expressed by a majority of seven or eight in a meeting of fifty or so of the Executive Committee of the National Union of Teachers? They passed a resolution approving of Sub-section (1) as it stood, and hoped that it would be made law. That was a strong argument in favour of the sub-section. The fact that the one class which had any real temptation to wish that no alteration should be made in the law had, through their most responsible representatives, declared in favour of the proposal of the Government was a very strong fact. He thought on the whole those who sat on the Liberal side of the House appreciated the importance of this proposal of the Government, but in his view it would be better if this Amendment was now disposed of rapidly in order that the Committee might get on to other matters of great importance which it was hoped would be discussed to-day.

*SIR HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities) said he must commence his observations by saying how much he admired the eloquence and spirit with which the hon. Member for the Richmond Division of Yorkshire had dealt with the question. He said that all the more strongly because he was unable in any way to accept the conclusions at which the hon. Member had arrived. He spoke to the Committee as one who represented a larger number of teachers, he believed, than any Member of the House. In the constituency he represented there were 1,200 teachers, and 300 or 400 of those were employed in schools in England. He was sure he was voicing their views, quite as strongly as a small majority at a meeting of fifty members of the Union of Teachers, in saying that they resented, as much as they would resent any test that could be imposed upon them, this embargo on the most sacred part of their teaching. One of the practical difficulties of this matter was this: Where were they going to get teachers to come in for forty minutes in the morning and to leave their work thereafter? In a school of 800 children they required twenty or twenty-one teachers of secular education, and they could not have only one teacher for religious instruction any more than they could have one teacher for secular instruction. How could they bring in twenty or twenty-one teachers for forty minutes and then turn them adrift? But a greater difficulty was with regard to the discipline of the schools. Did not hon. Gentlemen think that that would be interfered with by a man coming in to take up the task of religious instruction in which the regular teachers were forbidden to take part, or to perform what they on that side believed was the most important duty which teachers could perform? But he would not dwell upon the technical or mechanical difficulties, although everyone acquainted with the inside of a school knew how serious they were. What he wished to speak of was the intellectual work of the school. They grappled with difficulties in their educational advance; they made experiments and they made mistakes; but if there was one thing which in recent years they had advanced towards more than another, by a comparison of all the views of those most interested in the subject and a comparison with the methods indifferent countries, it was that education was not the gathering of a few elements of information, but that it was a whole, a whole in which one part was dovetailed into another. If they lost sight of that the work became mere mechanical drudgery. Were they to give up the training of character and the formation of moral conduct in the schools? The teacher might teach truth, duty towards one's neighbour, and so on; but if he went into questions of the higher sanction that would be entering on forbidden ground. Would hon. Members who sent their children to the higher schools of the country be content that the headmaster should be cut off from the most sacred part of the instruction of the young? Look at the reformatories. How long would those schools perform their work if the teacher was debarred from touching upon religion? It was argued by the hon. Member for the Richmond Division that the teacher must serve one master only, but was it not the case that there had been hitherto two authorities in the elementary schools? He had often noticed during these debates how much that fact was neglected. There was the authority of the State and the authority of the local controlling power. The State was purely secular. Never had the Board of Education as representing the State any right to interfere with religious instruction, even to ask whether it existed in the school or not. The State paid nothing for it, and all that it did was to see that there was not too much religion and that it was taught under certain restrictions. The religion was attended to by the local authority, but the teacher served both authorities. The hon. Member for North Camberwell yesterday quoted certain words of ethical doctrine from the Code. The very fact that they appeared in the Code excluded the possibility of their being religious, because under the Education Act of 1870 the Code was forbidden to touch any religious question at all. He contended, therefore, that the teachers heretofore had satisfactorily carried on their work in obedience to these two authorities, the one having the supervision of religious education and the other of the purely secular. Why should not the teacher carry on the higher and most important part of religious teaching? He wished to treat the matter also in the interests of the teachers themselves. Were they going to deprive the teacher of what he had hitherto felt to be a great part of his work, namely, the building up of the character of the pupil? He would appeal especially to his fellow Members from Scotland. What were they proudest of in the elementary education of Scotland? Was it not the parish schoolmaster of old days whom they were proud to recognise as one of the best specimens of his race? What would the old parish schoolmaster have thought if religion had been excluded from his sphere of education? Would his school have held the place it had in the history of Scotland, or built up Scottish citizens for the great work they had done for the Empire? Were they going so far to forget these traditions, to be false to them, to underrate the great work they had done, by telling the teachers that they might teach their pupils secular subjects, that they might cram them with elementary knowledge, that they might, if they were so disposed, give them a few precepts of more or less ethical force, but that when the pupils' enthusiasm was awakened to more sacred things they must curb their desires in that direction?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.) expressed admiration of the manner in which the hon. Member who moved the Amendment made his points so clear, and also complimented the hon. Member behind him for the admirable reply he had given. Both these hon. Gentlemen bore ancient Parliamentary names, and he thought there was no doubt that they would maintain the reputation of those names in time to come. It was impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment. It would, in homely vernacular, "knock the bottom out of their own Bill," and it would make it difficult to answer the question which would be put to them from many quarters, "What are we going to get for our million of money?" The privilege of paying rent was not one which commended itself to the inhabitants of this country. They would naturally expect that if they did that there should be some difference in the mode in which the schools were conducted, and some hing to indicate the recognition of the right of the public in the schools. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had spoken of this Bill the other day in a manner which attracted his attention. It was not a complimentary manner. The right hon. Gentleman was no doubt a master of compliments, but he had not happened to be within earshot of any of them. He said the Bill was a bad Bill, but it was a Bill very difficult to mend. There was truth in the statement, not that the Bill was bad—that he admitted to be controversial—but that this was not a Bill of which they could at any moment take up a clause and amend it so as to turn it inside out. It was an undenominational Bill, and its object was to establish, at all events in the rural districts, an undenominational kind of religious teaching, to enable the existing councils when they thought fit—as most of them had thought fit in the past, and would in the time to come, he hoped, think fit—to arrange for a form of religious teaching which he would go to the grave convinced met the desires and wants of the great masses of the country. The hon. Member who had just sat down had made a speech from which it might be supposed that the unhappy teacher under this Bill would never have any opportunity of enforcing on his pupils the divine sanctions of religion, or in any way of getting at their hearts and imaginations through that great and holy channel. That was not so. All teachers would tell him that it was not only through the catechisms and formularies of a Church that they were able to give religious teaching in its most effective form. Although he did not ask them to be satisfied, if they were not so minded, with the kind of teaching which it was the Government's object to establish in all the schools except in those frankly denominational schools contemplated by Clause 4, he did protest against announcements that there was to be no religion in those schools at all, and no opportunities given to the teachers to use religious examples and exercise religious influence. That was not the Government view. Yet the hon. Member drew a picture of a teacher in one of these schools cut off rudely from all opportunities of doing good in the way that he wished to, as if a great barrier were to be erected between him and his pupils which he could not cross, simply because he could not use the formularies and catechisms of the Church The reason why the clause was necessary was that in the greater part of the schools the ordinary teacher would be giving undenominational teaching as part of his duty. In the large majority of cases that would be so. There might be exceptions, and although what he had laid down was applicable to nine-tenths of the whole situation it might not be perfectly applicable to the remaining one-tenth. They contemplated that this Cowper-Temple instruction was to be given by the ordinary teachers because it was to be the school instruction and ought to be given by the teachers. The mover of the Amendment had laid stress on a teacher's believing in the definite instruction he was giving, and there was no means of securing that an ordinary elementary teacher believed in special dogmatic teaching. They could not dive into the depths of a man's mind, or tell how far a bishop of any church believed in the doctrine he was preaching; and from both Church of England and Nonconformist preachers he had heard discourses which led him to doubt if the preacher believed the doctrine he was expounding in the sense in which ordinary plain people believed it. They could not absolutely secure that; and that being so, they could not do better than leave it to voluntary effort. In that there was some security that the pupil would get the definite precise teaching. Even then there would be no absolute guarantee of belief, for no church had yet succeeded in accomplishing that, but there would be more chance of sincere belief by voluntary effort than by any other method. He had got into trouble when he had spoken of the canonical duty of the clergy; but surely it was recognised as part of the duty of the clergy to instruct the young in their own creed! There was no need to remind the clergy that it was a duty which they, in the first instance, should undertake. At any rate he thought he was justified in reminding the clergy of the Church of England that this was not a duty that they could impose upon State aid. He was amazed to hear the hon. Member who had just sat down say it was impossible to get such teaching in large schools. He was disposed to agree with the hon. Member for the Richmond Division of Yorkshire that the new duties would call forth new energies, which would enable the Church of England, never slow in discharging its educational duties, to provide religious instruction to the children whose parents desired it—they would continue to give that instruction and in a more organised form. He was afraid it was too often true of ministers of all religions that they too readily assumed that the school children were receiving the most satisfactory form of religious instruction. Nothing was more easy than to assume that all was going well if one did not inquire. Let one keep away from schools, reformatories, workhouses, prisons and he might become optimistic and believe that all was going on well. But let him go into a Church school, listen to the teaching given, watch the intelligence of the children, see how far they understand, and it would be admitted that religion was shockingly badly taught in the majority of schools. If this clause was bad it was bad with the badness of the Bill, which proceeded on an undenominational, but religious basis. He believed the children would continue to receive the religious instruction called for by the country, and that it would be good teaching according to the qualifications of the teacher. He emphatically denied that they were cutting off religious teaching when cutting off denominational teaching to be given by the ordinary teacher. In the case of schools provided for by Clause 4, the teaching would be given by the teacher of the school, for the reason that the denominational character of the schools was recognised. Of course if they believed that undenominational teaching was repugnant to a Protestant community the Bill would be an impossibility; but basing themselves on experience of the past, and knowing the wishes of parents, the Government felt themselves on firm ground, and could not consent to the Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the right hon. Gentleman had followed his usual formula when he said the Bill must necessarily be a bad Bill from the point of view of the Opposition, but in the attempt to defend the Bill on its merits and by reason he sometimes got into trouble. The right hon. Gentleman had said that they could not gauge the qualifications of a teacher to teach children the highest truths of religion. That might or might not be true, but if true it was as true of Cowper-Temple teaching as of denominational teaching. The right hon. Gentleman had also told the Committee that he was prepared to go to his grave with the firm unalterable conviction that the Cowper-Temple teaching was the form of religious teaching the mass of parents among his fellow countrymen desired.

Mr. BIRRELL: In schools.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said it was not a very easy proposition to resolve, and one of the difficulties was that of naming any form, from the literary and moral instruction of Dr. Clifford to the dogmatic Christian instruction in the Catechism. Which of these two things, which differed as far as north and south, and as far as two sets of opinions on this great subject could differ, was the right hon. Gentleman going to his grave in the belief that the parents of this country desired for their children? He wished the right hon. Gentleman would tell them which form of this municipal religion the parents of the children really wanted. Until they knew, they were utterly at sea as to what this religion really meant. When the right hon. Gentleman said that he admired Cowper-Temple teaching, he certainly did not mean merely literature and morality, as Dr. Clifford did.

Mr. BIRRELL: He is not a syllabus.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said Dr. Clifford was not a syllabus, but he was a force. He was the admitted leader of a particular school of religious thought who held with vehement conviction not merely that denominational teaching ought not to be admitted, or encouraged, or paid for in our elementary schools, but also that there was no logical resting-place between denominational teaching and something which was not religious teaching, but literary teaching. It was perplexing that they should have sitting in the front Bench opposite two gentlemen who both told them that the people of this country, at all events in the country districts, only required one kind of religious teaching, and when they were asked what kind of religious teaching, one indicated that he meant literature and morality, and the other that he meant what everybody would describe as dogmatic, though not denominational, Christian teaching. He would like a little more agreement among Members of the Government on this important point. The inconsistency of the right hon. Gentleman did not stop there. He had told them that, although they could not judge whether a teacher was or was not fit to teach denominational religion, they could judge whether he was fit to teach Christian religion. What a strange distinction; what an amazing paradox! The defence of this clause made by the hon. Member for the Richmond Division was much clearer and more forcible than that made by the Minister for Education. It was quite clear that the hon. Member regarded this clause as an attack upon the Church of England. He said it was quite true they had duties to the Church of Rome, which they had attempted honestly to carry out in Clause 4, but they had no duty to the Church of England, except to destroy her present position. The hon. Member, following the example of many who held that opinion, had told them that by destroying the present position of the Church of England they would do that Church a great deal of good; that there would be developed a great body of trained denominational teachers, who would go from voluntary school to voluntary school, and do all the denominational work that was required of them. He did not know whether that was a practical scheme or not, but if the hon. Gentleman was so anxious to aid the Church of England in becoming a more effectual educational machine, why did he not apply the same health-giving process to the Church of Rome? He thought that what the hon. Gentleman really wanted was to turn the Church of England out of all the schools from which it was possible to exclude her. He could not do it in the urban areas without also injuring the Church of Rome. But in the country districts the Government and the hon. Gentleman avowedly meant to do all they could so to modify our education laws that the Church of England would be excluded from her own schools, and the method of teaching which she had adopted would be allowed no longer. He did not think he was exaggerating the animus observable among a large number of gentlemen opposite. They had attempted to supplement a rather crude and ungenerous policy by something which seemed to him to be absolutely rotten from the beginning, and which their own speeches showed to be rotten. Let them take the example that occurred in the speech of the hon. Member for the Richmond division. The hon. Member said it would be unfair to the teachers to require them to teach Church of England dogmas. A teacher might go to a village where the teachers had been in the habit of giving Church of England teaching, and if he was unwilling to give that teaching he might be subjected to social pressure, and his life made very uncomfortable. The hon. Gentleman's argument, if it was worth anything, was as valid against sub-section (1) as it stood, as it would be against the Bill if this sub-section were excluded, because a teacher who went to a village where Cowper-Temple teaching had been given, and was unwilling to teach undenominational religion, would be subjected to the same pressure and the same social ostracism. The hon. Member had described the Amendment as an interference with freedom. If it was a step in the direction of freedom to prevent teachers from giving denominational teaching, which they were willing and anxious to give, the hon. Member should go a step further towards perfect freedom, and say the teacher who was willing and anxious to teach undenominational religion should be forbidden to teach it He thought that in the speeches of the Minister in charge of the Bill, and of the hon. Member for the Richmond division, there was no allusion to the interests of the children themselves. There was one admission in the speech of the hon. Member for the Richmond division. It was unfair, he said, to the teachers to make appointments in village schools of teachers who were qualified to teach the kind of religion which the parents desired. Unfair to whom? He seemed to think the teachers existed only to give secular instruction; that religion was an "extra" and ought not to be considered in the qualifications of the teacher. To ask a teacher whether he was able to deal with reading, writing, and arithmetic, and secular instruction generally, was right, but to ask whether he was also qualified to teach religion, denominational or undenominational, was unfair to the teacher. He was utterly unable to put himself in the frame of mind of those who deliberately constructed their Bill for the avowed purpose of preventing people who were ready to teach something which they believed from teaching that something to those who were anxious to be taught.

MR. ACLAND: It could be taught in the Sunday schools.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether freedom was to exist on only one of the seven days of the week? What he was really unable to understand was how hon. Gentlemen could, from the mere dislike of the Church of England [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] ——

MR. ACLAND: I deny that I have any dislike of the Church.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he was quite unable to understand why those who desired to exclude the Church of England from her present position as a teaching body in elementary schools should be so over-mastered by that desire that they would, without seeing how paradoxical was their position, really prevent those who desired to teach from teaching those who desired to learn. That was an utterly indefensible scheme, and if anybody told him that that, or anything like it, was the view of the country when this Bill was discussed on the platform, he replied that they did not really understand what the view of the country was. He believed them to be under the wildest delusions on that point. The Minister for Education had said they could not accept the Amendment because, if they did, what should they answer when the question was put to them, "What are you spending your million on?" Had it really come to this—that the Government came down to this House and suggested that out of their not too flourishing finances a million should be expended with the avowed object of preventing those teaching what they were qualified to teach to those who were desirous of learning it? They posed as the advocates of ecomony, they claimed to be the real guardians of the money of the taxpayers, and then they came and proposed to spend that money in order to destroy the position of the Church they disliked, although at the same time they prevented the children of the country getting the education the parents desired for their children. That was what they were doing under this sub-section.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said he hoped that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the grant of money would be repeated when the question came to be discussed as to how this money should be allocated. The precise scope of this sub-section, which the Amendment proposed to omit, was to prohibit the teacher who, receiving his salary from the State, had become a State officer, from devoting his time and services to the interests of a particular denomination by no means co-extensive with the State whose employee he was. He did not see how that was an attack upon the Church of England which simply reduced the Church of England to the same position as other religious bodies of having to provide for its own propaganda among its own children and other people's children. The Church demanded that this State officer should teach doctrines at the expense of the State, including Nonconformists, to whom those doctrines were in some cases abhorrent, and in many cases dangerous from the point of view of their own faith. That, according to the Leader of the Opposition, was the right of the Church, and, if they attacked that right, the right to perpetrate that gross inequality and injustice, they were attacking the Church, they were manifesting a dislike of the Church. The Nonconformist bodies had expanded and prospered upon the voluntary system. They had heard a good deal about the sacrifices which the Church of England had made; but they did not hear of the vitalising sacrifices which the Nonconformists had made. They did not regret them nor did they put their hands into the pockets of their fellow-citizens in order to repay them for these sacrifices. They had pushed their creed into the lowest slums of our great cities, and not content with that, they had carried their energies into the uttermost parts of the earth. They had done that on the voluntary principle. They had not asked for State aid; on the contrary they had spurned State aid; and they had thereby intensified the spirituality of their work. It was possible for those who did not avail themselves of the ministrations of the Church of England to believe that that Church would gain by the application of those principles; but why should they be charged with having a dislike to the Church of England? He wondered how the right hon. Gentleman would like it if he were charged with a dislike of Nonconformity? He was not going to make any charge against him. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had so far examined his feelings towards Nonconformity as to know whether he liked it or not, but, judging simply by his policy, he seemed to regard Nonconformity as a very objectionable form of faith, and to consider that the needs of Nonconformity, from the point of view of its propaganda, were sufficiently met by school teaching which did not concern itself with the special doctrines of Nonconformity at all. The right hon. Gentleman desired to maintain the grievance against which the country so emphatically pronounced at the last election, and to continue the system under which the Church of England should be able to draw taxes, tithes, and rates from non-assenting members of the community and so save itself from the cost of conducting the propaganda and the spread of its own particular doctrines. In these schools, the property of the State, it was to be unjust, according to the right hon. Gentleman, that the teacher should serve the State rather than some particular denomination. Having taken over the schools as their own property, paying rent for them, they were to leave them substantially under the control of the Church, because, of course, they were to teach their own doctrines and they were to have teachers who understood their doctrines. They knew what was the very essence of Church teaching. It did not consist in the hymn or the prayer or the Bible. He had heard the Bible referred to throughout the debate by hon. Gentleman opposite as a sort of Nonconformist volume. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh" and "Withdraw."]

THE CHAIRMAN said he must request hon. Gentlemen not to keep on calling "Withdraw."

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I trust, Mr. Chairman, you will use your influence with the hon. and learned Solicitor-General to induce him not to make use of unnecessarily provocative language.

SIR W. ROBSON said they had had Bible teaching referred to as if it were a Nonconformist function, satisfactory to the Nonconformists but repulsive in many cases, if standing alone, to those of other denominations. Why should they be told by one of the Bishops that Cowper-Temple teaching, simple Bible teaching, was a dread alternative, and by another that it was the thing they wanted to avoid. If they said these things they laid themselves open to the charge that they regarded Bible teaching as a Nonconformist and not a Church of England mode of teaching, and they were treating it as a Nonconformist creed of faith which was not to be treated as a Church of England creed of faith. The grievance of hon. Members opposite appeared to be that they were not allowed to have in schools which were transferred to the State and for which the State had to pay—that they were not to be allowed to have those schools and those teachers devoted to the propagation of a particular creed of their own. Originally the Party opposite put forward a plea for some kind of equality to be afforded by all-round facilities, but the moment all-round facilities came to be dealt with in this debate they were told that they were impracticable. The contention of hon. Members opposite was grossly unjust to other religious denominations and represented a policy which had been condemned by the country and he hoped would be condemned by the House.

MR WYNDHAM (Dover) said the Solicitor-General had provoked many who sat upon the Opposition side of the House, and it was not the first time that he had used provocative language. The object of the hon. and learned Gentleman's interventions in these debates passed his comprehension. He did not know whether the learned Solicitor-General felt it necessary after the events of last night to fan the fires of religious hatred, for his speech amounted to an expression of hatred towards those who differed from him in religious matters. That sort of speech did not move him to anger. On the contrary he preferred it to much that they had heard on the other side. He should like to have a verbatim report of it distributed as a leaflet at every meeting which they, on that side, addressed. It revealed the real motive behind this Bill and its ultimate objective, and made it plain that the Bill was an attack upon the Church of England. Such attacks were part of the traditional apparatus of the Party to which the hon. and learned Gentleman belonged. They helped the Party when in political difficulties and raised the spirits of those amongst their supporters who believed that the doctrines of the Church of England were false and that the doctrines that they themselves held were true. For men who indulged in persecution on that ground he had some respect, because they thought they were doing good to their fellow countrymen and at any rate they had the courage of their convictions. Theirs was an intelligible position, although old fashioned, but still it was entitled to respect. What he did not think was entitled to any respect was the newer mode of explaining this Bill and clause as really a blessing in disguise to the Church of England, and the designs of the Government as much wiser and better than those of the pastors of the Church, who understood her true interests and how her children might be brought up to be true and believing members of that great and ancient institution. The Solicitor-General had told them that the Nonconformists had done a great work in the slums, but he did not refer to the work which the Church of England had done in those places, although everybody knew that the Church of England had made enormous sacrifices in regard to them. The Solicitor-General had taunted them with regarding the Bible as a Nonconformist volume. He should like the hon. and learned Gentleman to make that statement before some of their meetings in the country. He would find that the interruptions in this House were as nothing to the kind of interruption he would encounter there, in consequence of the stormy passions which such a statement would arouse. How could the hon. and learned Gentleman ask them to believe that this clause was not of an invidious character? It was admitted that Clause 4 would help the Roman Catholic Church more than the Church of England, and that the Church of England must look to Clause 3 for any facilities they might enjoy under this Act. It was admitted that the Free Church Catechism, from the first syllable to the last, would be taught by teachers if this Bill were passed in its present shape, because it was included under Cowper-Templeism. [The SOLICITOR-GENERAL dissented.] It had been subscribed to by four Nonconformist Denominations, Baptist, Congregationalist, Wesleyan and another. This was an invidious clause in an invidious Bill aimed directly at the Church of England. By this prohibition which was laid upon teachers they were returning to methods long since abandoned of naked religious persecution. This disability was put on a large number of men simply because their religious beliefs were not those held by the majority who supported His Majesty's Government. The chief objection to the "all-round" facilities which were to be afforded was that they would bring persons into the school other than the teacher, and that the teacher's place would be taken by somebody else. This, moreover, was only to happen in the case of the Church of England, whose whole system of education was to be uprooted, and the standard of whose religious education was to be impaired, because the Government insisted that in the case of the Church of England, and only in the case of the Church of England, the teacher was not to be permitted to give the religious instruction which he had given in the past and which he desired to give in the future.

*MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University) said it was remarkable that, while in other respects the freedom of the teacher was most jealously safeguarded, suddenly in this clause they came upon a harsh compulsion, which was exercised only in the case of a teacher in a transferred voluntary school. The teacher on the regular staff was forbidden to give the teaching of the denomination to which he belonged even in the hours set apart for that distinctive form of religious instruction. Surely it was as much an infringement of liberty to forbid a man to teach religion, if he wished to do so, as to compel him to teach it, if he did not so wish. On what grounds could that compulsion be justified? Why must an outsider be introduced when there was a competent teacher on the spot? The Minister for Education rightly set aside one ground that had been put forward in the early part of the debate, that it was in the interest of educational efficiency. His reason was quite different. He said that this was an undenominational Bill, and that if this sub-section was bad, it was "bad with the badness of the Bill itself." If that was so he would put this question to the right hon. Gentleman: Why give facilities at all? And still more, why say, as he had repeatedly declared, that the facilities under Clause 3 were intended to be a reality and not a sham? This sub-section could not have been better framed if it had been specially designed to make the facilities under Clause 3 nugatory. Everybody knew that there were very few persons, especially in country districts, besides the teacher who, between the hours of 9 and 9.40 in the morning, were free to give others religious instruction. The only other persons were the clergyman and perhaps a retired teacher; but of these, again, only a few were qualified to teach effectively. It was a most difficult thing to give a simple Bible lesson to children. How many in that House could do it? He personally had been teaching during a great portion of his life, but he would feel serious doubts as to his own power. The children needed the best teaching that could be got, and it was a wanton wrong to deprive them of the services of the skilled teacher whose heart was in the work. What would be the impression left on the minds of the children when they saw the teacher silenced whom they most respected? They must conclude that the religion of their parents was a mere adjunct, a thing tacked on loosely to secular education, outside the teacher's duties, outside of school hours, something which could not matter much so far as their daily life was concerned. This prohibition affecting the teachers was, in his view, one of the most important features of the Bill. "Who is the teacher?" was a more important question than "What is the syllabus?" Above all, in elementary teaching the first essential was to have a trained teacher. He asked the Committee to contrast the requirements for secular and for religious teaching respectively. The idea of secular education had been deepened and vitalised. New and great demands were made on the teachers. They were not content to accept the leavings of other professions. They looked for men who were trained to their difficult task, trained to patience, tact, and sympathy; men who were enlightened by knowledge, inspired by enthusiasm, whose spirit was quickened by daily contact with the fresh minds of the children; men whose simplicity and sincerity went straight to the heart of the young; who spoke out of a full heart and a full mind and did not serve up fragments of knowledge, old and cold. When, however, they came to examine the Bill they found that in religious instruction it ignored the need of knowledge, of trained sympathy, and of intelligent control. In no part of the Bill was there any direction that the man who taught religion, Cowper-Temple or any other, should possess any knowledge of this subject. And this particular clause silenced by direct enactment the trained teacher who often prized as his highest privilege the right of teaching what to him were living and breathing truths. The clause lowered the place and dignity of religious instruction and would in its working inflict a grave injury on both religion and education.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that if anything could have induced him to support this sub-section it would have been the speech of the hon. Member for the Richmond division of Yorkshire, for whom he prophesied a brilliant career in this House. But he differed entirely from the conclusions to which the hon. Gentleman had come. The hon. Member said the chief merit of the sub-section was that by means of coercion it provided a way for teachers being free. He did not deny that there were cases where coercion was needed in order to obtain freedom, as in the case of great industries. But if people sought freedom in that way they must be extremely guarded in the way they proceed. The teachers were denied the right, when they volunteered to do so, to teach the religion in which they believed. He readily accepted the provision of the following sub-section to exempt teachers from religious tests and give them liberty to refuse the duty of teaching a religion they did not feel called upon to teach; but he wished to know on what principle of logic they said that a teacher should not be allowed to teach the religion of the Church of England if he was willing to teach it, and believed in it, while he was allowed to teach Cowper-Temple religion. Was that their idea of freedom? There were many people in this country who did not believe in Cowper-Temple religion, and there were a growing number who did not believe in Christianity in any shape. If a teacher said he could not teach any religion he ought to be allowed liberty to refuse to teach it. But why did they give the teacher liberty to teach Cowper-Temple religion and refuse him liberty to teach Church of England religion? He could not see that at all. The hon. Member had said that if a teacher came to a village school and said he could not teach religion, pressure might be brought to bear on him. But the principle of the Government was this: because Cowper-Temple religion was acceptable to the Nonconformists and a large section of the Church of England, the teacher might teach it, but they would not extend to him liberty to teach Church of England or any other religion. The liberty of the teachers, therefore, was liberty for those who agreed with the Government and not for those who did not. That was not his idea of liberty, and it was not consistent with the traditions of the Liberal Party. The hon. Member for the Richmond division of Yorkshire had said that the rights of Catholics were safeguarded under Clause 4, but that was not true. Clause 4 provided that "where extended facilities are so afforded, the local education authority may also, if they think fit, permit the teachers employed in the school to give the instruction desired." That permission would not be required but for the first sub-section of Clause 7, and that was why they were opposed to it. The sub-section was coercive and interfered with the liberty of the teacher.

*Mr. SOARES said he was lost in wonder at the attitude of hon. Members on the Opposition side with regard to this clause. They had constantly been saying that the Bill was an insult to the Church of England, but the attitude which they were now taking up was an insult to the Church of England parson. What were they asking for ? They were asking that the religious denominational teaching in transferred voluntary schools should be given by the trained teachers and not by the clergymen of the Church of England. What was their object ? Did they allege that the clergyman was unwilling to perform that duty ? The Minister for Education had said that it was the canonical duty of the clergyman to teach the young, and in the country districts they had plenty of time to perform that duty. The clergymen in the country districts were both underpaid and underworked as a rule, and a little more work in this direction would not do them the slightest harm. Did hon. Members say that the Church of England clergymen were incompetent to perform this duty ? The late Patronage Secretary had said they were going to put religious teaching in the hands of those who were least qualified to give it, meaning of course the parsons. Surely if the parson was qualified to teach adults he was qualified to teach the children. Did they not hold children's services and did they not consider themselves competent to hold them ? It was the clergyman's business to teach the young, and surely hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side were not prepared to say that clergymen of the Church of England were incompetent to do that. A clergyman who was genuinely interested in his work and wanted to take the utmost advantage of his office would be only too pleased to have the young people under his care at the most plastic period of their life, because they would afterwards come to him with their religious difficulties as they got older. Having regard to all the circumstances, he was at a loss to understand how hon. Members could desire the omission of this clause.

*Mr. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) said that the hon. Member had misinterpreted the position of the Opposition. He had stated that they desired to substitute entirely trained teachers for the clergymen, but that was not so. What they wanted was the alternative of getting the best possible teacher to give specific instruction, and that was the object of this Amendment. If they could get a clergyman, why not allow him to go in ? They did not want to abolish the possibility of having a trained teacher, because if that teacher volunteered, and if, in the opinion of the parents, he was a satisfactory teacher, surely he was the best possible person to undertake the teaching for the discipline of the school. Why should he be excluded by this clause ? Hon. Members had twitted the Opposition with taking up an inconsistent position, but they had failed entirely to realise that their own position was very inconsistent with their former views on this question. They used to hear a good deal about sacerdotalism, and there were perpetual accusations in the last Parliament that the policy of the late Government was nothing else but sacerdotalism. This clause was going to prevent a teacher from teaching this very thing, and it introduced the clergyman or the priest. Was that sacerdotalism ?

Mr. SOARES : Why are you fighting it ?

MR. EVELYN CECIL said he had already explained that the Opposition were fighting for alternatives, and the hon. Member's own position was one of sacerdotalism. He could not congratulate the Ministerial Front Bench upon their defence of this sub-section, for he had expected some argument which would appeal to an impartial mind. What had the President of the Board of Education said? He had merely observed that the Bill was difficult to amend; surely that was a very feeble argument. If they thought an injustice was being done, they were within their rights in making some effort to remove it. The right hon. Gentleman said that the teacher might be able during the time of secular instruction incidentally to bring in a little religious instruction. It seemed to him that it was poor consolation and a poor defence of this subsection to hold that out as an inducement. There was no guarantee that there would even be this incidental religious instruction. The Solicitor-General had made some remarks which caused some irritation, and had said that the policy of the Opposition was grossly unequal. When they considered the provisions of Clause 4, surely everyone of those criticisms could be directed against the Solicitor-General himself. Why was Clause 3 to be excluded in this matter when Clause 4 was included? The teachers who were to teach ordinary facilities under Clause 3 were not to be allowed to teach those ordinary facilities but they might teach extended facilities under Clause 4. He could not see the reason for that distinction, and it was not fair, because it was giving a privilege to the schools under Clause 4 which was not given to the schools working under Clause 3. He could not see any reason for this difference being made except that Clause 4 most specially applied to Roman Catholic schools and was a bid for the Irish vote, and Clause 3 only applied to them in a much less degree. The hon. Member for the Richmond division of Yorkshire had spoken of this provision as a charter of freedom for the village teachers. It was a charter to them to teach what the hon. Member desired, but it was not a charter of absolute freedom. Then, again, this was only a charter of freedom to urban schools and not to rural schools. He did not see any reason why trained teachers should not be allowed to give specific teaching if they were competent, if they volunteered, and if the parents desired it. It would be grossly unfair if this sub-section was adopted.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) did not see how the hon. Member opposite could made out that this subsection was a fair provision. Under it the teacher might be allowed to teach Cowper-Temple religion, but why should he not be allowed to teach any other form of religion? Why should the teacher be allowed to teach only that form of religion, namely, the Cowper-Temple teaching, which satisfied hon. Members opposite? It simply was not fair, and it could not possibly recommend itself to those who did not believe in Cowper-Temple religion. The more one looked into this scheme the more one came to the conclusion that, taken as a whole, the object of the Bill was to endow one form of religion at the expense of other forms. Church of England people, Catholics, and other denominations had to pay their share of the rates, yet in the vast majority of the schools this new form of religion was to be taught and practically none other. That was a one-sided arrangement. It would be much fairer, if they were going to put this disability upon the teacher, to say that he should not be allowed to teach any form of religion at all. There would then be, at any rate, some semblance of fairness. The facilities under Clause 4 might or might not be given. The local authority might or might not allow the teacher to teach any particular religion. They were entirely at the mercy of the local authority, and they were at the mercy of whoever might happen for the time being to be the head of the Education Department. Under these circumstances he really did not see how they could expect that those who did not believe in the Cowper-Temple form of religion should be satisfied with this. He confessed that the whole discussion was fraught with a good deal of embarrassment and pain. There was not the slightest desire on his part or on the part of any Catholic Member intentionally to say anything which would be in the slightest degree offensive to the opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite. They did not in the slightest degree find fault with those who were satisfied with simple Bible teaching. They were entitled to their opinion, and it had their respect, but they did claim that those who could not accept that particular form of religion should have their opinions respected also, and that there should not be a hard and fast rule laid down that under this Bill, which was supposed to deal with the people of the country generally, making it impossible for any teacher to teach any religion but the Cowper-Temple form. They were going to be called upon to pay their fair share of the rates. They did not complain on that account; all they asked was that as they were going to pay man for man the same proportion as Nonconformists and members of other denominations, they should at least get the same fair play which was to be given all through this Bill to those who were satisfied with Cowper-Temple teaching. It was far better for everyone concerned that there should be a policy of give and take so that there might be the hope of the Bill attaining success instead of being passed in a shape which would leave many denominations dissatisfied, and give rise to fresh agitation and disturbance in the country, and so necessitate the whole matter being re-discussed in the House at an early date.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) said the speech of the Solicitor-General had given very great pain on the Opposition side of the House and they felt that they had been very much misrepresented and something very much like slandered. The hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of their having a feeling of repulsion to Bible teaching. That was exactly the opposite to what was really the case. They founded themselves on Bible teaching. The Prayer Book was founded on Bible teaching, and so was the Catechism, and they only claimed the right of teaching and interpreting the Bible in their own way. What they claimed for themselves they conceded to every Dissenter in the country. This clause seemed to be the climax of a long series of confiscations of religious freedom and the rights of conscience. Church teaching was to be confiscated in favour of that approved by Dissenters. The rights of Church parents were to be confiscated by and to give place to the rights of Dissenting parents. The freedom of the local authority in acting for the parents of the children was to be curtailed. The children's rights and interests were utterly forgotten and ignored. And now it was the teacher's turn. He was to be straight-waistcoated and to have his liberty abridged. Why should not the teacher have the liberty of teaching what he sincerely believed in to those who were anxious to learn? It was the only thing he could teach well—that in which he believed. If he were allowed to teach it they would double his influence; if they prevented him from teaching it, they would half his influence. Why should they introduce this interloping outsider?

AN HON. MEMBER: Does the hon. Gentleman refer to the clergy?

MR. MIDDLEMORE said he was not specially referring to the clergy. Undoubtedly the clergy would not be able to get in to give this teaching, as they would not have the time. The first thing they would get would be a disorderly class, for the influence of the teacher would be weakened. If they tried to introduce this clause into Scotland it would be rejected with scorn. If they tried to introduce it into Ireland it would be met with rebellion. He believed it would be only possible to maintain it in England if faith failed them, and they were willing to adopt moral teaching without the sanction of worship and of religion.

MR. BIRRELL said there were many Amendments to be considered this evening and he hoped the Committee would come to a decision on this one.

*MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) said that unless there were good reasons it was a strong measure to prohibit a man from teaching what he wanted to teach. One reason given was that the teacher was the servant of the State. A postman was also a servant of the State, and no one would debar him from giving religious instruction in a school. Another reason was that in villages if they allowed the teacher to teach the Catechism they would create a special demand for those who were willing to teach the Catechism and exclude others, and that this would be unfair to the teachers, or some of them. What he suggested was that there would be no disadvantage to the community in having teachers who were willing to teach the Catechism so long as they had other teachers who were willing to give Cowper-Temple teaching. He urged that the clause should be confined to schools where there was only one teacher.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) said there had been an extreme paucity of arguments from the Government side of the House in support of the clause. There was no argument in the speech of the Solicitor-General. It was simply a denunciation of the Church of England. When the hon. and learned Gentleman said that Churchmen were complaining because they were asked to provide for their own propaganda he failed to remember what the position hitherto had been. All that they asked was that they should be allowed to employ and pay for teachers who were willing to teach. When the hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Nonconformists schools had thriven without the aid of the State he should remember that the very form of teaching favoured by Nonconformists had been provided at the expense of the rates. Under these circumstances a reference to a manual giving the history of elementary education in this country might assist the Solicitor-General. The hon. Member for Barnstaple had dwelt on the duty of the clergyman to teach in the rural school, but he had said nothing of the similar duty that might fall to the clergyman in the urban schools. The hon. Member had said that no hardship could possibly arise from the exclusion of the ordinary teacher of the school from the giving of religious instruction, because the clergyman would come in and teach, but he should bear in mind that there was an appreciable number of rural villages where the clergyman had left the giving of religious instruction with perfect confidence to the teacher who was willing to give the instruction, while he looked in from time to time and occasionally took part in the teaching. There were other cases in which the clergyman could not teach. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman had himself tried his hand at teaching. If he had he might have found that everyone had not the capacity for it. It was not everybody who could approach the mind of a child in a rural elementary school. This clause had been called a charter of freedom for the teachers. So far from being a charter of freedom it appeared to him to impose a definite disability on the teachers. They were told also that it was a boon to the villages. He really wondered what picture of a rural village was present to the mind of the hon. Member who talked in that way. The squire was not always walking up and down the village streets scowling at the Nonconformists. The clergy were not always preaching against the wickedness of the Nonconformity. Nonconformist children were not always skulking about the streets cowed and abashed in the presence of Church of England children. The great bulk of the rural villages in educational matters were working very smoothly, and they would go on doing so until this Bill was brought into operation, if it was ever brought into operation. Then he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite, and particularly those who represented rural constituencies, would find the change not so much for the better as they supposed.

MR. GEORGE WHITE (Norfolk, N.W.) said that an hon. Gentleman who addressed the Committee this afternoon had charged hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House with inconsistency in the arguments they had brought forward. It seemed to him that there was a great measure of inconsistency in some of the arguments of hon. Members on the other side. The demand made on the other side was that a teacher, if he was to give religious instruction, should have the qualification for the task. That would make it absolutely certain that there must be tests. They could not know whether a teacher was fit to give special religious instruction unless they had tests. There were few Members of the Committee who would not admit that the two prominent things which this Bill was brought in to meet were, first of all, the existing tests in regard to teachers; and secondly, the question of local control. If this sub-section were cut out of the Bill the tests would be maintained, and that would be a gross injustice to many thousands of teachers throughout the Kingdom. It would entirely prevent their having equal chances of promotion. Unless hon. Members opposite were prepared to maintain that the tests for teachers should still continue he did not see how they could ask to have the sub-section excised. He had no doubt the Committee would by an overwhelming majority reject the Amendment, and by so doing they would get the thanks of the great body of teachers throughout the Kingdom. In a letter in the Schoolmaster the writer, who signed himself "High Churchman," said that he loved the Church, but loved freedom more, and he would rather that a hundred were prevented from teaching than that one should be forced against his inclination to give dogmatic teaching.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) said the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk had stated that in the division on this Amendment they would settle the question of religious tests for teachers. He wished to point out that under the Bill there were to be different classes of schools. There would be tests for the teachers in some of these schools. It was very clear, therefore, that in regard to the State-aided schools they would still have a test. The "four-fifths" schools would, under this clause, remain in exactly the same position as at present and they would have exactly the same tests. Turning to the provided schools, the teachers would have to prove to the local education authority that they were able to give undenominational teaching under the Cowper-Temple Clause. Therefore, again, the local authority must have some test. He insisted that that was a distinct endowment of one particular form of teaching as against others. Therefore, they found that in every class of school a test would still remain.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

*MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said that the Amendment he now moved was that a teacher employed in a public elementary school should be allowed to be present during the time allotted for special religious instruction for the purpose of maintaining discipline. This Amendment was, perhaps, not so important as others which had been discussed, but it was still substantial. In regard to the schools under clause 4 and the old board schools, no difficulty would arise, because the teacher in that case would give the instruction; but there would be a difficulty in the case of schools under Clause 3 where denominational instruction was to be given on two days in the week. Unless the teacher were allowed to be present during the time that religious education was given the discipline of the school would suffer. Therefore he thought the teacher ought to be present to maintain that discipline. The religious instruction would be given by the vicar, the Nonconformist minister, the curate, the parish worker, or perhaps by a perfect stranger, and although they all must agree that in many cases these people would be able to maintain discipline, yet there would be many cases in which they could not do so. Under Clause 3, two forms of religious teaching were to be allowed and the danger of that state of things was obvious. The Committee ought to have some enlightenment as to whether the inspector of the Board could or could not come into a school where religious instruction was being given. If the inspector could come in why could not the teacher also be present. He begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 13, after the word 'school,' to insert the words 'may be present during the time allotted for special religious instruction for the purpose of maintaining discipline, but.'"—(Mr. Ashley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BIRRELL said that the Amendment provided that the temporal power should be present during the time that religious instruction was being imparted; in other words, that the man with the stick should be there. There was nothing in the clause which prohibited the teacher from being present while religious instruction was going on, and he did not think that it was necessary to insert in the Bill an obligation upon the school teacher to be present. He might be engaged in giving another kind of religious instruction elsewhere.

LORD R. CECIL: Then he may be there?

MR. BIRRELL replied that of course he might be there. It was entirely a matter of arrangement and not one for statutory declaration. He had no doubt the teacher who had to look after the character of his own school would see that he was occasionally present, until such time as these young and unruly persons could be brought to bear religious instruction at the hands of their pastors and masters. He did not think there was any necessity for the insertion of the words. He did not think moreover that the inspectors of the Board of Education had anything to do with this religious instruction. He thought that religious intruction was a very important thing in connection with these schools, and he would be glad if their inspectors were able to give them reports as to the way in which the religious education was conducted. He thought the teachers would be better for the criticisms of the inspector, but the latter had no locus standi to visit the schools when religious instruction was being given.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) inquired how, if the inspector might not be present, the clause was going to be carried out.

MR. BIRRELL did not think the presence of the inspector during the hour of religious instruction was in any way necessary to secure full effect being given to the clause. If a teacher gave the religious instruction of a special character which the clause prohibited him from giving, he would be doing an illegal act, and the local education authority could deal with the matter. The inspectors of the Board of Education had never had devolved upon them the duty of inspecting religious education in the schools.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said it appeared that the ordinary teacher must not even strike the tuning fork for the purpose of religious instruction, and what he wanted to know was whether there ought not to be some Archbishop of Cowper-Templeism who would decide whether the unfortunate religious teacher was doing right or wrong. He wanted to put a particular case. Supposing a perfectly conscientious teacher was giving instruction which he thought carried out the provisions of Cowper-Templeism, and the local authority said that it was not the Cowper-Temple form of religion. The right hon. Gentleman declared that the inspector was never going to be present and that it was not his duty to be present. The teacher might be an atheist, and who was to judge between the local authority and him? If there would not be any judge he wanted to know what was the value of this clause. He put that question to hon. Gentlemen below the gangway opposite who thought that they were getting relief from the terrible Church of England. This was really an attempt to blindfold the devil in the dark. The teacher might teach what he liked, and if there was any dispute between the teacher and the local authority and there was nobody to judge, he thought that the last state would be worse than the first.

*The CHAIRMAN said he did not know how the hon. Gentleman was going to end his speech or he would have intervened sooner. They were not dealing with the question of Cowper-Templeism nor even of the supervision of the Church of England. They were dealing with the question of whether teachers should or should not give instruction of a special character, and the Amendment proposed that the teacher should be present at the religious instruction for the purposes keeping orders only.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said his point was that if the ordinary teacher might not be present and the superior authority was not to be represented what was the value of this clause? It was entirely new to him that the State was not going to supervise the carrying out of the provisions of the clause.

Mr. BIRRELL said that religious instruction was no new thing. It had gone on since 1870, and the inspectors of the Board of Education had never had devolved upon them inspection of the religious instruction in the schools. They had never said anything about it and had never criticised it in any way, and under that system Cowper-Templeism had gone on pretty satisfactorily and was likely so to go on.

*The CHAIRMAN said they were not talking about Cowper-Templeism at all, They were dealing with religious training of a special character.

Lord R. CECIL supported the Amendment, which he thought would prevent a hostile education authority from forbidding the attendance of the teacher during the hour of religious instruction and so adding further weight to the burden which denominational religion would have to bear under this Bill. They wished to take care by the Amendment that the religious instruction accorded by the religious teacher should not be regarded with dislike and disapproval by the parents of the children to whom it was given. The teaching of religion might be handed over to someone who might injure the school, and their contention was that the teacher should be allowed to be present to keep order and to show by his presence that he did not disapprove of this teaching. He attached great importance to the Amendment, though he had given up all hope that any justice or generosity would come from hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had entered upon this discussion with some hope that justice would be done, but he had been disappointed. The local education authority might do their best to keep the teacher out, so that the lesson would probably be given under circumstances which would render it of no importance or effect.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 105; Noes, 375. (Division List No. 182.)

Tellers for the Noes—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry) said the Amendment he now moved was intended to extend to the teachers the same religious liberty on week days that sub-section (2) extended to them on Sundays. They had heard a great deal about freedom, and abolition of tests, and mandates for the abolition of tests, but his Amendment would give the teachers liberty to do as they liked, and not as the Government liked. The way in which the Government were carrying out their mandate reminded him of the American who said, "We have absolute liberty; everyone does as he likes, and if he won't do it we make him." The right hon. Gentleman said the local authority would be entitled to ascertain whether the teachers were or were not unfitted to give Cowper-Temple teaching, so that the freedom given here was very one-sided. They were not to be free from tests such as Nonconformists desired, but only in such cases where the tests could possibly be of any advantage to the Church of England. There was a good deal of apprehension in the House as to the attitude of voluntary school teachers on the point. He believed that the large majority of school teachers did not wish to be prevented from giving special religious teaching. The Liverpool and District Voluntary School Teachers' Association, which represented over 600 certificated teachers, had, after very careful deliberation, passed a resolution to the effect that in transferred schools the ordinary teacher should not be precluded from giving religious teaching of a special character. He thought that represented the opinion of voluntary school teachers all over the country. He claimed for the teachers the right to give, or to abstain from giving, religious teaching of a distinctive character. He did not suggest that there should be any compulsion in the matter. He wanted to give the freedom to refuse or to agree to give religious teaching which they thought themselves most capable of giving. He thought that many teachers would find it difficult to adhere to the Cowper-Temple form of teaching. Therefore they ought to be free not only to refuse Cowper-Temple teaching but to give special religious teaching with which they had been familiar for years. It was perfectly absurd to say that by giving to Church schools Church teachers they were interfering with educational progress. If there were more teachers than schools, then they might fail to select the best; but there were not enough certificated teachers to go round, and so this proposal could not interfere with educational progress. It was quite possible that the whole of the children in a school under this Bill might wish the same trained teacher to teach them who had been giving them this instruction before. But they could not have that teacher unless they put in some Amendment such as he had suggested. Anyone familiar with village life for any considerable period must have observed that there were devoted and earnest school teachers who, although fully qualified by secular qualifications to take a post where they might have got higher remuneration than in a Church school, had consented to forego such an appointment because of their devotion to their own religion. They should consider the effect that such an example would have upon village life, and then they would be able to realise that by depriving hundreds of villagers of advantages like that they would be doing a vast amount of harm and no good whatever. He earnestly begged the President of the Board of Education to seriously consider the amount of harm this clause would do as it stood, and the amount of good that could be done by accepting the Amendment. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 14, to leave out the word 'give,' and insert the words 'be required as a condition of his or her employment to give or to abstain from giving.'"—(Mr. Bridgeman.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'give' stand part of the Clause."

MR. BIRRELL said the hon. Member's speech seemed to say over again what they believed to be a misapprehension of the consequences of adopting this Bill. He wished to point out that there was no strict interpretation by law of Cowper-Temple instruction. He thought the hon. Member's dread of local education authorities came with rather an ill grace from him, because he knew perfectly well that so far from desiring to take this view, the difficulty was to get them to take any interest at all in the matter. There was no reason whatever to suppose that they would spend their time going about trying to find out the precise flavour and quality of the religious teaching which was being given by a really good teacher; all they were anxious about was to see that the school was kept in good order, and that there was a large average attendance. He would suggest to the hon. Member, who was most fair-minded, that there was no ground for his fear lest the devoted and earnest teacher, who was such an advantage to the village, would be prevented from giving precisely the same religious teaching which he or she had been in the habit of giving, except so far as that teaching was purely catechetical. They did not think they were interfering with the teacher giving sound religious teaching in accordance with his or her convictions. One of the merits of the syllabus of instruction was that in no way did it put any restraint upon the conscience or upon the utility of the teacher, who was able to give without any restriction whatever, that teaching which his or her good feeling would lead him or her to adopt. This Amendment was really bringing up the same facts as the one already disposed of. The Committee had come to a conclusion upon the question of excluding the regular teacher from the task of giving this facility teaching, and they could not consent to an Amendment which would have the effect of throwing open the door to conditions which they could not admit.

*MR. CAVE said the fact that this clause if passed would silence the teacher was a matter within the knowledge of them all. Devoted men and women had for years past given denominational teaching. This section proposed that they should no longer be allowed to give that form of religious instruction even if they were anxious to give it, and the local education authority desired that they should do so. He did not believe that the majority of the teachers were in favour of this clause. He knew that the Church of England teachers and the teachers of other denominations objected to it. At a meeting of London teachers, at which more than 1,500 of the teachers in London voluntary schools were present, a resolution was passed unanimously strongly protesting against the proposal to forbid the teachers to give denominational instruction and claiming on behalf of every elementary school teacher absolute freedom to give or refrain from giving any religious instruction whatever, denominational or undenominational. That resolution showed that 1,500 London school teachers objected to be shackled in this way. Surely there was no harm in allowing them to continue teaching what they had taught before? Again, how were they going to enforce this provision? He did not envy the position of the Board of Education if the Board was called upon to punish a teacher who ventured to give teaching of this kind. They were claiming freedom for the local education authority to prescribe that their teachers; should or should not teach. Clause 3 teaching was to be a legal form of instruction, and all they were asking for was freedom to give what had already been sanctioned by Parliament. They were asking for this for the sake of the children. Surely it was admitted that whatever teaching was sanctioned by law ought to be efficiently given. The hon. Member for North Camberwell had told them that teaching given by outsiders would not be so good as the teaching hitherto given by the teachers in voluntary schools. The teacher had influence over the school, and loomed large in the eyes of the children; he was most likely to succeed in getting a hold over their minds and in instilling into them the principles of religion. Therefore, if they wanted effective religious teaching it should be given by the teachers in the schools. They wanted this matter left in the hands of the local authority, who would make terms with the teacher for giving secular teaching, and might at the same time agree to the terms under which, if willing to do so, he should give religious teaching. Nobody was asking that the State should pay for this religious teaching, and he thought that some such provision as was contained in this Amendment was necessary.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) said that in the village schools a provision like that contained in the Amendment might affect the appointment of teachers. A teacher might be qualified to give secular instruction but he might not be appointed unless he was able to satisfy the local authority that he was qualified to give dogmatic instruction as well. At the back of all this there was also the position of the teacher declining to give any religious instruction at all, but such cases were so few that he thought they might very well dismiss them altogether out of their consideration. His hon. friend desired that religious teaching in the schools should go on. With regard to the single school in the villages the teaching would be the same in the future as it had been in the past.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The hon. Member seems to be discussing the question which was discussed this afternoon. I understand that the Amendment deals only with a requirement or obligation laid down in the terms of appointment. We must not again enter upon a subject in regard to which a long discussion has already taken place this afternoon.

MR. YOXALL said it had been stated that the teachers in voluntary schools as a rule desired to have full liberty with regard to this religious teaching. He wished to point out on the other hand that there were also a great number of people who did not desire that this liberty should be given, and they felt that to give it would interfere with the liberty of a good many other teachers. He could assure the Committee that the teachers generally did not desire this particular Amendment to pass.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Bridgeman and Mr. Cave.

*LORD R. CECIL moved an Amendment, the effect of which, he said, would be to forbid a teacher from giving undenominational as well as denominational instruction. It would put the teacher in the position of not giving any religious instruction at all except under Clause 3. He had listened with attention to the debate with reference to this matter, and had endeavoured to ascertain the objections to the employment of the teacher to give the special religious instruction under Clause 3. In the first place it was said that if once a teacher was allowed to give denominational instruction they would introduce tests by a side wind. Were they not introducing tests if they allowed a teacher to give undenominational instruction? He did not believe that any hon. Gentleman, except perhaps the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, had really made himself acquainted with what undenominational instruction meant. He would take for illustration the syllabus of the county of Cornwall. It was a very elaborate and highly dogmatic form of religion, and it might be shortly described as the Free Church Catechism put in the form of a syllabus. He did not wish to throw any scorn on the Free Church Catechism, but anyone who had read that document would agree with him that it was highly dogmatic. He found in the syllabus a provision that at a certain stage in the curriculum the scholars were to repeat with suitable explanations the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, and other things. Then he found this note—

> "The teacher shall explain the Holy Catholic Church to mean the whole body of Christian people dispersed throughout the world, and the words 'He descended into hell,' to mean that he descended into the unseen world.'"

He would not discuss here whether that was or was not the right interpretation of the words, but it was an interpretation which a considerable number of Christians in this country would not accept, and certainly it would not be accepted without explanation. He did not think hon. Members from Ireland would dispute that proposition. He was not competent to say what all the Members of the Church of England would say, but it was quite plain that the Roman Catholics would not accept the meaning given in the note. Suppose a Roman Catholic applying for a teachership were to say: "I see your syllabus. Am I expected to teach that?" "Oh, yes," said the local authority "You are expected, but you may refuse." What was to happen? Was that a test or not? Were they to inquire whether a teacher could or could not teach that doctrine, or were they to accept him without inquiry? In the case of an agnostic or an atheist, how were they to ascertain whether such a person applying for a post held opinions which would prevent him from giving effectively and conscientiously dogmatic teaching such as was contained in the Cornwall syllabus without submitting the teacher to a test? It appeared to him that under this clause they could not allow a teacher to give Church of England teaching, even though willing, because it would inevitably involve looking about for a teacher who could give that instruction conscientiously. Precisely the same reasoning applied to undenominational teaching. He could not conceive any reason which could come from the Ministerial side of the House which should prompt teachers to give undenominational teaching if they thought it wrong to do so. The argument was brought forward by the Solicitor-General that because teachers would henceforth be State officers they must have nothing to do with denominational religion. Why should they have more to do with undenominational than with denominational religion? It had been argued that to allow teachers to give denominational instruction would be a hardship on the minority. He had never been able quite to understand why it was a hardship on the minority to allow teachers to give the teaching which they believed to children whose parents desired that the teaching should be given. He presumed it was because it put the children in a better position to receive the instruction they desired than the minority children who did not desire that instruction. There were many who would reject and disapprove of the undenominational teaching. He took for the sake of example the Cornwall syllabus, though there were others much more offensive from the Church of England point of view. Unless they accepted his Amendment, they were going to say that the children might be taught that syllabus, and in that sense the teaching was endowed by the State. Were the Government going to say that it was a hardship upon the minority to allow the majority to receive from the State-paid teacher the particular religious instruction which the majority preferred? If they did, he submitted that as a mere matter of logic and justice, that position was absolutely indefensible. If they insisted upon forbidding the teachers in the Church of England schools to give teaching which they believed in and in which the children believed, the Government were bound also to forbid teachers to give undenominational teaching. Otherwise, they would be endowing a particular form of religion with State funds, and the people of England would understand what the Government were doing. [MINISTERIAL dissent.] He did not expect to convince hon. Gentlemen opposite; but he did expect to make some of them uncomfortable. He had had the advantage of discussing this matter with some of the voluntary school teachers, and many of them told him that they were anxious to teach the religion in which they devotedly believed, and which the children were anxious to receive; and these teachers also informed him that the religious instruction which the children received was the only barrier between them and sin and crime. He demanded justice and equal treatment for all religions. If they forbade the teachers to give denominational instruction, then they were bound equally to deny the same privilege to the undenominational teachers.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out in Sub-section 1 all the words after 'instruction' in line 14 to the words 'under this Act' in line 17.'"

Question proposed, "That the words proposed be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the arguments in favour of sub-section (1) which had been put forward that afternoon had not been believed in by those who put them forward. Amongst others the speech of the Solicitor-General appeared to him to be equally lacking in logic and in taste. It was as offensive as it could be to those who happened to differ from the Government. It showed clearly that hon. Gentlemen opposite objected not to dogma, but to the Church of England. It was an outrage both to the teachers and to the parents of the children that the teachers should be prevented from teaching that which they were prepared to teach and which the children were prepared to receive. The measure of liberty left by the Bill was not sufficient. It was utterly inadequate; but it was a measure of liberty so far as it went. According to the speech of the Minister for Education it permitted full Church of England teaching to be given provided the schoolmaster abstained from mentioning the Church Cathechism. If the right hon. Gentleman was right in his interpretation, that was a considerable measure of liberty and he did not wish it to be restricted, but he objected to the way in which it was put. It would sometimes lead to evasion on the part of the teachers if they were to be allowed to teach the most orthodox doctrine of every denomination provided they refrained from using the formularies of that denomination. He did not wish to restrict what liberty was given and, therefore, while agreeing with much that had been said by his noble friend, he was not able to support the Amendment.

MR. STUART (Sunderland) said he very much doubted whether this Amendment was in order, because the Committee had, at an early period of the discussion on this Bill, decided against secular education. If the Committee would look for one moment they would see that the result of carrying this Amendment would be that in all provided schools there would be no religious teaching at all, because it was not possible to give religious undenominational teaching except through the master of the schools. The only schools in which religious teaching would be given would be those which had facilities under Clauses 3 and 4.

LORD R. CECIL: Why would it be impossible to give religious teaching in the provided schools?

MR. STUART: Because there was only an arrangement under Clauses 3 and 4 for giving the denominational religious teaching which had existed before. He very much doubted whether this was strictly in order, and it was only on account of the Deputy-Chairman allowing it to proceed that he felt it must be in order. He wished to point out, however, that the Committee had decided at an early period of the discussion on this Bill against secular education.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that he had spent a day in looking through the syllabuses of the different education authorities, and he should like to know what was the religion of the Dowager Lady Tweedmouth. The point was of immense importance to Bath, because that lady was to distribute the prizes for religious knowledge to the Bath children.

All these syllabuses involved some form of dogmatic teaching, and the teacher who observed them must have passed some form of religious test. There were some extraordinary things in these syllabuses of a most controversial kind. In a syllabus for the North Riding of Yorkshire amongst the orders to the teachers was one which said—

> "It is sometimes said that in a council school no religious teaching corresponding to such an ideal can be given."

What was the ideal? The same syllabus went on to say—

> "It is historically true that the plain and practical Bible teaching which can be given and often is given in such schools is a powerful factor in the formation of the character of the people. History shows that in the days when our nation has been greatest the Bible has been an inspiring force as a record of God's dealing with man, as a revelation of what God is to man, and what man is to God."

He should like to ask any hon. member present whether he could deny that that involved some form of dogmatic teaching. He was dealing with this matter with a profound feeling of respect, and his object was to show that this was dogmatic teaching, and the very reason why it inspired him with respect was that it was dogmatic. Under the Barrow-in-Furness Council there was a long list of things to be taught and most admirable they were; in fact they constituted a much more complete religious education than ever he got himself in a Catholic school. He agreed that everything depended upon the spirit in which the religious teaching was given. He would like to ask how they were going to get their religious teachers without tests of some kind? In the Barrow-in-Furness syllabus it was provided—

> "In the Old Testament lesson the lives of persons who are considered to be types of Christians and prophetic allusions to the coming of our Lord should be carefully explained and impressed upon the children."

How could any man who was not a believer in some form of religion explain the Bible to the children with regard to the coming of our Lord. How was it to be done? And yet the Committee was told that in Barrow-in-Furness they did not need any tests for teachers. What did it all mean? He perused the syllabuses with the greatest respect for the men who drew them up. He thought they did such men infinite credit, but he said that they necessarily led to dogmatic teaching. He admitted that the Government had a difficult problem in trying to reconcile the various divisions of the Protestant Church into agreeing to have some elementary instruction in Christianity combined with secular teaching, and he ventured to assert that this clause in most cases would turn out to be an absolutely dead letter. There was nothing to prevent the teacher teaching what he liked, as all through the day he could make his views about Christianity felt. He would not support the noble Lord's Amendment in the division lobby, because he thought it was better that the children of Great Britain should get Cowper-Temple teaching than no religious teaching at all, and that if this instruction was given reverently it was a great deal better than that no form of religious views should be expressed. But to state that Cowper Temple doctrine did not involve dogma was to state an absurdity. Instead of attacking the State Church the Government were setting up another State Church. He did not see why the Nonconformists were not entitled to do that. It was like a concurrent endowment, provided that they did not interfere with the Roman Catholics and Anglicans. Therefore while he sympathised with the noble Lord he asked him whether he considered it well to try and deprive Nonconformists of the valuable Christian teaching they would get under the Cowper-Temple form so far as it went, and whether those who were Roman Catholics and Anglicans would not be wiser in confining themselves to doing the best they could for their own forms of faith without seeking in any way to infringe on the Christianity of other sects.

MR. BIRRELL said the noble Lord wanted to prevent the ordinary teacher from giving a kind of religious teaching for which he had no great liking, but which he need not therefore treat with disrespect. Personally he was anxious that these debates should increase the stock of knowledge of the people as to what was really going on. If people knew more than they did as to what went on in the ordinary Church schools and in the Board schools they would really feel that the issues involved in these debates were not so terrible as they sometimes were represented. He hoped that the volume containing the syllabuses would soon be published, because he believed they would have the same effect upon others as they had had on the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Louth, namely, that it would be seen that they had produced no disposition on the part of the majority of county councils in the country to injure the religious teaching of the children. The authorities were anxious under these syllabuses to do the best they could with the children under their charge. The syllabuses made no pretence to divine inspiration, and therefore it was not obligatory on every teacher to treat them as if they were declarations of his own Church. The syllabuses merely indicated the line of tuition the teacher had to take up; they did not interfere with his own spiritual independence, or impose upon him such a serious religious or theological obligation as might be supposed if they were treated as a confession of faith instead of as an indication on the part of the authority as to what it wished to be taught to the children. The Leader of the Opposition had said that the Amendment of the noble Lord had settled the Government, and that they had no answer to it. But the noble Lord had not settled the right hon. Gentleman himself, who claimed the right to differ entirely from him and said he could not support him in the lobby. There again he put it to the noble Lord quite candidly that his Amendments really said the same thing over and over again, namely, to have undenominational schools. But the Government had attempted in the great Protestant schools of the country to allow for a definite kind of religious teaching. He had never used the word "undogmatic" as applied to religion. If they undertook to teach religion without dogma there would be neither a Church of Rome nor a Church of England. The foundations of all creeds were those stupendous dogmas which were taught in every school where religion was attempted to be taught to the children. Personally, he avowed that the Christian teaching which was given in the schools of the country was dogmatic teaching, and that was the kind of teaching which the Government believed could be taught without giving it that denominational flavour whose object was to attach children at the earliest possible age to some branch of the Church. That was where they differed. The Government believed that this teaching could be given so as not to interfere with a subsequent union with a religious community, so as not to emphasise the points on which Christians differed, but to seek as far as possible to unite their attention on those points upon which Christians were agreed. The noble Lord's speech was in favour of secular education. He for one would always protest against secular education. It would be a monstrous and unfair thing, in order to get out of a difficulty, to compel parents to send their children to a school where they did not receive some form of definite religious instruction. He asked the noble Lord, therefore, to take the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition and not to continue this tit-for-tat argument. In this Amendment the noble Lord had not the support of his own side. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had made a study of of these syllabuses and who was a devoutly religious man did not wish to prevent the children of this country having some opportunity of getting from the hands of a devout teacher good religious teaching. Nobody did, and therefore he asked the Committee for God's sake not to do anything that would interfere with a good religious teacher giving excellent religious teaching to the children.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON thought that the right hon. Gentleman had fairly stated the broad views before the Committee. Nobody on the Opposition side of the House had shown any contempt for Cowper-Temple religion and, if they had, a careful study of these syllabuses would have shown them that there was an infinite amount of good religious teaching to be found in them.

MR. LOUGH: You called it municipal religion.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said that was so. The form of Christianity approved by the municipalities in which it was taught was emphatically municipal religion and the term was used in no offensive sense. On the other hand, there was a large body of opinion who maintained that it was very desirable that a child should be a member of some religious community, and that he should receive, not only during his school life, but when he went out in life, the teachings of that denomination. He regarded the noble Lord's Amendment as a reductio ad absurdum, and he could not say that he desired to see it accepted. But it gave a logical form to the proposals of the Government, which as they stood were neither logical nor just.

LORD R. CECIL said that his Amendment, which had been rightly described as a reductio ad absurdum, had been moved more in order to see what was to be said against it than to see it carried. In fact, he did not think he should like to see it carried. He was satisfied with the very moderate argument that had been urged against it. What did the right hon. Gentleman say? The right hon. Gentleman said—"We must have some religion, but we must have a religion which is not confined to any particular denomination." Many hon. Members supporting the Government took the view that it was not a necessity to be a member of a definite religious body, and that, therefore, it was not essential to teach the children that it was part of their duty as Christians to be members of a definite Christian body. The view of many on the Opposition side, however, was that it was essential, if children were to be brought up as Christians, that they should belong to a definite religious body. [AN HON. MEMBER: Which?] It did not matter half so much which, so long as the child belonged to one definite body. He did not believe they would find one in ten of the devout Christians of the country who did not belong to one or other of the Christian bodies. The point, however, on which the Opposition differed from most Nonconformists was not as to whether the child should be a member of a Christian body, but whether it was essential that the main part of its Christianity should be taught in the public elementary school.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said he was afraid the noble Lord was not speaking to the Amendment.

LORD R. CECIL said he was carried away by the desire to explain the views he held on this subject. He would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD BALCARRES moved to omit Sub-section 2. The President of the Board of Education, in his speech to a deputation from the Jewish community, said the intention of Clauses 4 and 7 was that the teachers should remain the same as they were, viz., those who were most qualified to give the particular religious instruction which had hitherto been given in the schools. Since then the right hon. Gentleman had stated in the House that that would apply to the next generation of teachers as well as the existing body of teachers. He had also repeated that he adhered to the statement made to the Jewish deputation. He wanted to know how the right hon. Gentleman's hope was to be realised that the schools should go on substantially as now under full denominational facilities in conjunction with Sub-section (2); and how the denomination or managers, or whoever was responsible for these facilities, in the future would be enabled to ensure that the teachers would be invested with the same rights and status. So far as he was concerned, he had not the smallest objection to saying that a teacher should not be required to subscribe as a condition of his appointment to any religious creed; but he would point out that the provision in the sub-section was not inconsistent with inquiry into the capacity of the teacher to give religious instruction in the Roman Catholic or Church of England faith in order to ensure that he was competent to carry out those particular duties. He desired to have a precise declaration from the Government as to how far the clause carried out the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman both in this House and to the deputation of the Jewish community.

"In page 4, line 20, to leave out Sub-section (2)."—(Lord Balcarres.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'A teacher employed' stand part of the clause."

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL said that Clause 6 was a great step in the direction of secular education, and taking that clause and Clause 7 as they stood, they would have no guarantee whatever for the religious character of the schools. In the latter clause the Government attacked the teachers. He was greatly struck with the remark of the President of the Board of Education that the teaching profession was becoming a great secular profession. He had always regarded the profession as having a religious as well as a secular side. Any departure from that tradition would be mischievous, and, if carried beyond a certain point, fatal to the interests of the country. He had no doubt the Government were perfectly sincere in their statement that they wished the education of the country to be religious, but what security was there that that could be effected under this clause? Were they quite sure that the schools would not become purely secular schools? Supposing a master or mistress who was selected declined to give religious teaching, they could not enforce it. It was quite possible that in the days not far distant there would be a great disposition on the part of teachers to take no part in religious instruction. Connected as he was with training colleges, he could say that a feeling of that kind was beginning to exist, and he was afraid it might spread. He was by no means certain that if the clause became law the conduct of the schools on the present lines and according to religious principles would not become most difficult. He also wished to know whether the word "instruction" covered religious observances. He had in his hand the time-table of the Bradford Council, which was common to their schools and to the Church of England schools. It began the day in each case with a hymn and the Lord's Prayer, and closed with a hymn and prayer. At the end of the morning school a blessing was sought on the family dinner, and when the school met again thanks were given for the bounty of Providence in supplying that meal. He asked whether these religious observances were included in the religious instruction, and whether it would be possible under the clause for a teacher to refuse to perform that dignified office, so beneficial to himself and the children. If he could refuse to do so the school became, to his sorrow, and he believed to the sorrow of the Government also, a purely secular school. It was his strongest desire to avoid such a contingency.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) hoped the discussion would not be so prolonged as to preclude discussion of sub-section (4) in which the interests of teachers were involved. Unless an opportunity were given to discuss that question now there would be no time on the Report stage.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. LOUGH, Islington, W.) did not think the Committee need anticipate that much time would be taken up on this sub-section. So far as he could gather, the noble Lord was not against it, and, in fact, he hardly knew of anyone who was. The noble Lord had put to him one or two questions in reference to statements made by his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education. He was sure the Committee would not expect him to deal with those statements. They had often been discussed and explained by his right hon. friend, and any further explanation that was required should be asked of the President. As to the sub-section itself he thought it was one of the most simple, most admirable, and least contentious in the Bill, and it could not but improve the status of the teacher, since no penalty of a professional kind could fall upon him through his not belonging to a particular denomination. No one could deny that the suspicion which teachers had that certain openings in their profession had not been given to them unless they professed a certain creed must have a tendency to encourage a profession of religious belief on the part of those in whose minds it did not exist. The hon.

Baronet the Member for Wigan seemed to suggest that in the practical working of the sub-section it might be difficult for the local authorities to succeed in giving religious instruction. He did not think the hon. Baronet need have any fear. The best answer was that the religious teaching contemplated under the the Bill was now being given in 9,000 of the largest schools throughout the country to 3,000,000 scholars in average attendance, without any difficulty of any serious character having occurred in regard to it. The hon. Baronet asked what certainty there was, but it was very difficult to predict with certainty about anything in this world. But he did not think the sub-section would tax the powers of the local authority more than at present. It was clear in the clause that the teacher was freed from every religious test, and any teacher might say that he did not desire to give any form of religious teaching; he need not even give the Cowper-Temple form of religious teaching if he did not desire to do so. On the other hand the Bill provided for the giving of Cowper-Temple teaching in every school if the local authority desired it. He did not think a dilemma would arise if a teacher declined to give this form of religious teaching though the local authority wished it. He admitted that in the case of there being only one teacher such a refusal would create a more difficult alternative, but even then it would not cause any serious difficulty in getting an arrangement made. It seemed to him there would be only two alternatives, one of which would be to select a teacher at the beginning who had no objection to giving Cowper-Temple teaching. [OPPOSITION cries of "That is a test."] Was it not enough to say that in more than half the schools of the country the system was now working satisfactorily?

SIR FRANCIS POWELL wished to know whether the word "instruction" covered religious observance, such as opening with prayer.

MR. LOUGH said that was a question of interpretation. In his opinion it would cover what was permitted under Section 14 of the Act of 1870.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said the Parliamentary Secretary had congratulated himself on having given a satisfactory answer to a comparatively indifferent matter, but he ventured to think this was a matter of importance on which they had received no answer at all. The hon. Gentleman had told them that in many thousands of schools Cowper-Temple teaching had been given with the greatest regularity. He quite agreed, but this clause said that no teacher in future was to be required to give religious instruction, and it was laid down in the Code that the teacher should not be required to perform any duty not connected with the work of a public elementary school. Religious teaching, however, had hitherto been part of the work of the public elementary school, and the teacher's agreement therefore bound him to give that teaching. Under these circumstances it was not a matter for surprise that the difficulty had not yet arisen. But what would happen when the teacher was not required as part of his duty to give any religious instruction? Where was that exemption to be embodied? Was it to be henceforth an extraneous duty, and altogether outside the duties of a teacher in a public elementary school? Had the Parliamentary Secretary ever considered this question, and read the Code in connection with this Bill? Would an agreement requiring the teacher to give this instruction be henceforth an unlawful agreement? Would it be enforceable in a court of law? The relation of the teacher to the local authority was that of employed to employer, but he was not to be required to give any religious instruction. What, then, was the security that any religious instruction would be given? A teacher might say "I am not prepared to give religious instruction." The local authority could not require him to do so. How did the Parliamentary Secretary propose to meet such a case as that?

MR. LOUGH: If one teacher will not give it another will.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON asked what would happen where there was only one teacher assisted by pupil teachers in a rural school. This exemption of the teacher was a general exemption. It was very possible, if this feeling against religious teaching prevailed, that there might be three teachers in a school, not one of whom was prepared to give religious instruction. What then? Or supposing a teacher had agreed to give religious instruction and came down one morning and said he had changed his mind and would do so no longer; could the local authority terminate the contract?

MR. LOUGH said that this method of question and answer was not debate. He thought it would be better if the hon. Baronet would develop his argument.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON thought the hon. Gentleman would consider the clause of more importance if he had studied the Code. Seeing that religious teaching could not be required of a teacher, he wanted to know what security there was that such instruction would be given. He wanted to know what was to happen? He presumed that if any local authority made an agreement with a teacher in which the teacher bound himself to give religious instruction the Board of Education, in the event of dispute arising, would say that the agreement was not binding. If that was so, it was a new departure on the part of the Board of Education. Then he would ask how the clause would apply to contracting-out schools and to certified efficient schools. Would the Board of Education decline to give the Parliamentary grant to the former or would they cease to hold the latter efficient if the managers made an arrangement with a teacher that he should give religious instruction? With the latter part of the clause he was in entire agreement. He had always desired the abolition of tests for teachers where they took the form mentioned in the clause; but, having swept away the actual test, they came to the simple relation of employer and employed, and in ordinary employment it was not called a test if a man was asked whether he was able to perform duties he was engaged to perform. Then he came to schools under Clause 4. Under the Bill the appointment of the teacher was reserved, under all conditions of delegation, to the local authority. But the President of the Board of Education, in his answer to the Jewish deputation and in his subsequent statement in the House, had stated that in the schools under Clause 4 the teaching would go on precisely as it had done in the past. How was that result to be attained? How was it to be ascertained beforehand whether the teacher whom the local authority engaged was capable of giving the teaching, Anglican, Jewish, Roman Catholic, which was required in Clause 4 schools? Some inquiry must be made. Was that a requirement within the meaning of the clause? If the local authority were to make no requirement, they falsified the assurance given by the Minister for Education, and if they made a requirement, they broke through the bottom of sub-section (2) of this clause at once. He wanted to know, too, how it was conceivable that the promise of the Minister for Education to the Jewish deputation was consistent with sub-section (2) of Clause 7—how it was possible to ensure that special religious teaching was given under Clause 4 unless they made such requirement as to religious teaching as this sub-section would render a statutory impossibility. These questions needed an answer, and he awaited the answer with curiosity.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) said he did not wish to add to what he conceived to be the difficulties in which hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House found themselves in regard to the far-reaching and fundamental questions raised by his hon. friend. He wished to ask what was the real meaning and effect of this sub-section. A teacher in a public elementary school would be entitled to a certain fixed salary, which would be paid him for teaching all that was required of him, including payment for such Cowper-Temple teaching as he was ready and willing to give in the school. Supposing the teacher refused to give the Cowper-Temple teaching, was he to be docked of his salary, and if not, what was the effect of this sub-section? If not, the effect would be that his conscience had become, indeed, of a very considerable pecuniary value, inasmuch as by the exercise of his conscientious scruples he would be doing his employer out of three-quarters of an hour of his valuable services without any pecuniary loss. The hon. Gentleman opposite had said that the abolition of tests would improve the status of the teaching profession. That was an extraordinary statement, for it amounted to this,—that because henceforth no teacher would be bound to teach religion, the esteem in which he was held would be increased. He could not subscribe to that view. In arithmetic, geography, and other branches of secular education they had most exhaustive tests for the teacher. Inquiry was made as to his fitness to give instruction on these subjects, but the Minister for Education had introduced the extraordinary doctrine that on matters of faith and doctrine, which, by his own showing, were of the greatest possible value in our educational system, no questions were to be asked as to the fitness of the teacher to give even Cowper-Temple teaching. The dilemma in which hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches found themselves was a very real and practical one. What was going to happen in the case of a school looked after by the local education authority employing only one teacher, if that teacher refused, as he had a right to refuse, to give the undenominational teaching? Was that teacher to be dismissed? It was plain to his poor intelligence that hon. Gentlemen opposite had not practically considered the full effect of this clause. They were faced at every turn by considerable dilemmas. They had given no answer to the most obvious questions which had been put to them, and the Bill, as it stood, would inflict serious disabilities on men had done nothing to deserve them. He hoped his hon. friend would press his Amendment to a division unless a satisfactory answer was forthcoming.

Mr. LOUGH said he did not see any difficulty in answering the questions which the hon. Gentleman had put. He though the difficulties had been exaggerated. The teaching of religion would be put, if he might say so, on just the same basis as the teaching of history and geography. [Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!"] They asked the teacher of history and geography if he was competent to teach these subjects, and they asked the teacher of religion if he was competent in a similar way. What had been complained of by teachers was that however qualified they might be to teach history and geography, and whatever University or other degree they might have obtained, they were not allowed to teach these subjects unless they submitted to a religious test. Now the teacher would be tested in regard to his capability of teaching secular subjects only, and there would be no ignominious test applied to him as in the past. [An Hon. Member: Why ignominious?] Well, irrelevant test if they liked. He used the word in no invidious sense. He saw no difficulty in the questions put to him, and would answer them in their order. The first question was, whether it would be a matter of contract between the local authority and the teacher they were employing to give this religious instruction. It would, and they would see that they got a good teacher. The second question was, If there were three teachers and none of them would give the Cowper-Temple teaching which the local authority wanted, what were they to do? The answer was, they would get another teacher to do it. The third question was, Supposing a teacher had been employed to give this religious teaching, and a contract was made, and after that the teacher changed his mind and would not give the teaching, what would the local authority do? Well, they would get rid of him, and they would get a man who would fulfil his contract. The fourth question was, Whether the teacher who gave religious instruction would be in the same position as had been in the past the teachers who were asked to play the organ, a demand which could not be enforced. The answer was that the teaching of religion would be a duty connected with the school and obligatory under the Act, and therefore it could be imposed. The fifth question had regard to tests. It was asked what his right hon. friend meant by his statement to the Jewish deputation that everything would go on as it had before. He was glad to see that his right hon. friend had now entered the House, so he would leave that question to him.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said the Committee had had a most amiable explanation from the Parliamentary Secretary of the contents of the Bill and of the policy which lay behind the Bill. But though the explanation was amiable, he thought there was hardly a Member in the House who had not been absolutely stunned by it. They really did not know where they were, and he thought the time had come for the Minister for Education to relieve them from the anxieties into which they had been plunged by the speech of his enthusiastic subordinate. He would not deal with the last question to which the Parliamentary Secretary had referred, the only question which the hon. Gentleman admitted he was incapable of completely solving—namely, as to the explanation of his chief's answer to the Jewish deputation. That the hon. Gentleman said he would leave to the Minister for Education. Whether the hon. Gentleman would have been wiser to have left some of the other questions to be dealt with by the same high authority it was not for him to judge, but he might mention to the Minister for Education some of the perplexities of mind to which he had been reduced by the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary. In the first place, the hon. Gentleman had explained that religion was in the same scholastic category as history and geography, in the sense that just as the local education authority required the teacher in an elementary school to teach geography and history they were entitled to require him to teach religion; and just as they were entitled to inquire whether the teacher was competent to teach history and geography they were entitled to inquire whether he was competent to teach religion. The hon. Gentleman had further said that he regarded religious tests as either ignominious or irrelevant—he could not make out which adjective the hon. Gentleman preferred.

MR. LOUGH: Religious tests applied to the teacher of history and geography. That was what I said.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he should endeavour to deal with the increasing confusions caused by the hon. Gentleman as well as he could. The hon. Gentleman's argument now was that it was irrelevant or inconvenient to apply religious tests to a man who was asked to teach geography or history.

MR. LOUGH said he was sure the right hon. Gentleman had no intention of doing him an injustice. History and geography had been mentioned by an hon. friend behind him, and he had simply used the terms to illustrate the hard position of a teacher who, while fully qualified to teach these two subjects, could get no opportunity of doing so unless he was a member of the Church of England. That seemed to him to be a most intolerable test to apply to a teacher of history and geography. He said further that the various subjects should stand on the same plane.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he should try to explain his difficulty to a sympathetic audience. He would take the three subjects that had been mentioned—geography, history, and religion. If a teacher was engaged to teach these three subjects, it was quite clear that those who engaged him were entitled to see that he could teach them. The hon. Gentleman admitted that the local authority were bound to satisfy themselves that he could teach history, and that he could teach geography. By parity of reasoning the local authority ought to satisfy themselves that the teacher could teach religion. He did not think that was denied by the hon. Gentleman. In that case he could not understand why religious tests should be described as either ignominious or irrelevant. The geographical test was not ignominious or irrelevant; nor was the historical test. Why was religion alone of the three subjects mentioned not to be one to which the ordinary methods of investigation were to be applied before the teacher was engaged? That was his first difficulty. The second of his difficulties was much more serious. The sub-section provided that a teacher employed in a public elementary school should not be required as part of his duties as teacher to give any religious instruction. Those words at first sight seemed plain, but after the explanation of the hon. Gentleman they had become extraordinarily obscure. He said that under the plan of the Government it was part of the contract of the teacher that he should teach religion. Up to 10 o'clock that evening he thought that a person who entered into a contract to do a thing was required to do it. He now discovered that although the local authority could make a contract with the teacher to give religious instruction, the teacher who had entered into that contract was not to be required by the persons with whom he had entered into the undertaking to carry it out. He was confident he was not misrepresenting the hon. Gentleman. He had endeavoured to give to the Committee what he conceived to be the effect of the hon. Member's words, and he hoped the Parliamentary Secretary would take that opportunity of intervening if he had in any way misrepresented him. He had been asked what was to be done with a teacher who refused to carry out his contract to teach religion. The hon. Gentleman had given two answers. He had said that the local authority must get another teacher. If teacher A refused to carry out his contract, we must have recourse to teacher B. It seemed to him that so far as religious education was concerned that answer was satisfactory. If teacher A refused to give religious teaching, it was clear that the religious wants of the community would be satisfied if teacher B was found who would do the work which A refused to do. Then, however, the local authority had upon its hands two teachers—teacher A, who would not carry out his contract, and teacher B, who until the contrary was proved might be expected to carry out his contract. If teacher B refused, he supposed there would be a third teacher, C. No local authority, with the passion for economy with which all our local authorities were known to be animated, would like to engage two or three men or more to do the work for which one man was adequate. The problem arose, what was to be done if teacher A had been replaced for religious purposes by teacher B or C? The hon. Gentleman, brought face to face with this problem, rose to the occasion and showed the Committee the way out of the difficulty which had been created by teacher A's recalcitrance. He said simply, "If teacher A refuses to do what he has contracted to do, get rid of him." That was the policy of the Government which came in on a mandate to abolish religious tests. Had they come in on a mandate to abolish geographical tests and historical tests? He thought there was a great deal to be said for the policy. He wished the hon. Gentleman had had the conduct of this Bill throughout. According to the hon. Gentleman, geography, history, and religion were three things which teachers were engaged to teach; on every one of them, he presumed, they might inquire into the question of competence, and on each one of them, he presumed, they might dismiss the teacher if he proved to be incompetent. That was a policy against which he had nothing to say. They on the Opposition side, in total ignorance of the policy of the Government in connection with this clause, would have been completely satisfied if, on this sub-section at four o'clock in the afternoon, the Cabinet had announced what they actually meant in this matter. He did not desire—in fact, he disclaimed the idea—that any teacher should be asked to sign a document embodying religious thought. It never had been done, he did not think it ever would have to be done, and he for his part had not the smallest objection to its being forbidden by statute. He congratulated the Government on having found an exponent of their policy who had given equal satisfaction to both sides of the House, and whose speech was a model of precise lucidity, unmistakable in its terms, unambiguous in its general outline, and he congratulated the hon. Gentleman on having made a speech which he could assure him would allay fears and suspicions which had been widely aroused by the less fortunate interpositions of the Ministers near him.

MR. BIRRELL said he thought the speech to which they had just listened was rather unworthy of the right hon. Gentleman or of the dignity of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman had said he was himself opposed to any tests being required of teachers. If that were so, they might have been spared a good deal of the criticism in which he had indulged. The clause said—

> "A teacher . . . shall not be required as part of his duties as teacher to give any religious instruction."

That part of the clause was a conscience clause for the teacher, and having regard to the nature of the syllabus teaching which the education authorities required of their teachers, he thought it was a very necessary and proper clause. The clause went on—

> "And shall not be required as a condition of his appointment to subscribe to any religious creed."

Everybody knew that in times past many teachers in schools which received State aid and rate aid were required as a condition of their appointment to belong to a particular denomination. Questions were put to many of the teachers in voluntary schools, and they had to pledge their honour that they belonged to the particular denomination. That was a test of the kind most in people's minds at the last General Election. That was the test which this Bill was intended to abolish, and did abolish. The sub-section proceeded—

> "And shall not be required as a condition of his appointment to subscribe to any religious creed, or to attend or abstain from attending any Sunday school or place of religious worship."

Those words were put in to hit a practice prevailing in hundreds of Church schools, where teachers, no matter what their secular attainments, could only get the appointment by promising to go to church and to play the organ at the Sunday school, and otherwise to act as a kind of lay curate. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite were completely mistaken if they thought such conditions did not create in the minds of thousands of teachers a sense of indignity and injustice. Therefore, if this clause got rid of that it would be received with satisfaction at least by the Liberal Party in the country. With regard to qualification, he quite agreed that, supposing a man applied for a position as teacher who had in his leisure written agnostical works assailing the authority of the Scriptures, not in the manner in which they were assailed by high dignitaries of the Church, but in a manner calculated to give offence to those who attached authority to the Bible, then he quite agreed it would be undesirable that such a person should be considered by any local authority as qualified to give the religious teaching contemplated in the syllabuses which had been mentioned. [OPPOSITION cries of: "That is a test."] No, it was not a test. The local authority might perfectly well and safely be left to exercise its own discretion in this matter of the duties which it would impose upon its own teachers. These teachers might, if they desired to do so, protect themselves from any conscientious burden by refusing to give the religious teaching, in which case the local authority would have to find somebody else. In this Christian country it should not be an impossible task to find another person who did not claim this particular conscience clause. But those teachers who were not willing to give the particular teaching required could claim the protection of the conscience clause.

LORD R. CECIL said he really did not understand what the Government meant. They said in the sub-section—

> "A teacher employed in a public elementary school shall not be required as part of his duties to give any religious instruction of a special character."

And now they said if he did not give it it he should be dismissed.

MR. BIRRELL: I did not say he was to be dismissed.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, you did.

LORD R. CECIL: What do the Government mean?

And, it being half-past Ten of the clock, the Chairman proceeded, pursuant to the Order of the House of the 18th June, to put forthwith the Question on the Amendment already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, "That the words 'A teacher employed' stand part of the Clause."

Tellers for the Noes — Sir Alexander Acland Hood and Viscount Valentia.

Whereupon the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report progress; to sit again to-morrow.

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) [EXPENSES].

Resolution reported: "That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys provided by Parliament, of an additional annual grant, not exceeding £1,000,000, to be distributed among local education authorities in pursuance of any Act of the present session to make further provision with respect to education in England and Wales, and of the remuneration and expenses of the Commissioners appointed under such Act."

Resolution read a Second time.

Question, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution," put forthwith, pursuant to the Order of the House of the 18th June, and agreed to.

GREAT NORTHERN (IRELAND) AND MIDLAND RAILWAYS BILL [Lords] (By Order).

Read a second time, and committed.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.) said that in moving the Instruction which stood in his name, it was necessary, for the information of those Members who are not acquainted with the circumstances, that he should state the reasons why he and his colleagues thought it should be adopted by the House. In the first instance he would deal with the objection which the promotors raised. The railway companies urged that it would be unfair on the part of the House to dictate to a limited liability company as to how it should appoint its clerical staff. The answer to that was obvious. Railway companies came to this House for powers, privileges, and monopolies, and this House had a perfect right when conferring such monopolies to attach any restrictions and conditions it might think fit. The powers conferred were not in the nature of a gift. They were a public trust; and it was not only the right but the duty of Parliament to see that the trust was exercised wisely and to the public interest. He should show that the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland had not used its trust, so far as its appointments were concerned, either wisely or in the public interest, and upon that ground they asked the House to restrain this Company from further abusing the trust reposed in it. The second line of defence was that there was no precedent for imposing this condition on railway companies. That was true. But if no such condition had been imposed on any English company it was because no English railway company would dare to act as the Great Northern of Ireland had acted, and he had not the slightest doubt that when the House heard the facts it would decide that if there was no precedent, it would at once create one. In any event, they were dealing not with England where, as he had said, such abuses would be impossible, but with Ireland, and in Ireland there were plenty of precedents, for every important Irish railway except this one had already voluntarily adopted the system of open competitive examinations. What was their complaint? This was a new Parliament, but it was already old enough to have learned, from the performances of the Ulster Unionist Members, that the real reason of the opposition to Home Rule was the fear that their political and religious ascendency in Ireland would pass away. He thought it was Byron who said of Irish landlords that their being, end, aim, existence, was rent, rent, rent; and, paraphrasing that, one might say of the Irish Unionists that their being, end, aim, existence, was jobs, jobs, jobs. Not content with holding nine out of ten patronage appointments under Government in Ireland they controlled the appointments to all the Irish railways and nearly all the banks, which thus became a close preserve of the little ascendency gang; but public opinion asserted itself and the other chief railways thought it wiser to end this bigoted system and to throw their clerkships open to competition. Only a few weeks ago the Nationalist Members had opposed the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Bill, although his hon. friend the Member for North Wexford was one of the directors, until the hon. Member and his colleagues agreed to do what they asked the House to compel the Great Northern Company to do now They had no complaint against the Dublin, Wicklow and Wexford Railway, and their only reason for taking that step was that they desired to treat all railway companies, whether their directors were Nationalists or Unionists, with absolute impartiality The Great Northern was the only Irish Railway which feared the terrible consequences of competitive examinations. It stood shivering on the brink but was afraid to take the plunge, and he hoped the House would assist it in arriving at a right determination. He had in his possession full details of the salaries paid in all the departments of the company, but he should not weary the House with details. He might say, however, that in whole departments there was not one official who professed the political or religious faith of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people, of the population of the districts through which this railway ran and of its customers. Was not that an extraordinary coincidence? The salaries paid at the Dublin terminus—he did not include the weekly wages of workmen—amounted to £21,130 and only £720 went to officials sharing the predominant religious opinions of the country. At the Belfast terminus, it was the same story; the idolators got £895 out of £7,862; whilst in the manager's office, in the secretary's, in the cashier's, in the engineer's, there was not even one individual who did not subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles or their equivalent. There were sixty-eight officials drawing salaries of £150 or upwards, and with one solitary exception none of them could by any possibility be suspected of want of loyalty to the glorious, pious and immortal memory of William the Third. These figures were too remarkable to be accidental, and were strongly at variance with the results of every competitive examination in Ireland. He had read in an Orange paper published in Befast that if their demands were conceded the loyal minority would be driven out of Ireland. Well, if the loyal minority could not stand the test of competitive examinations, it was the only argument he ever heard for their extermination, and he regretted that such an argument should come from a Party that claimed to have two-thirds of the wealth, three-fourths of the patriotism, and an absolute monopoly of the intelligence of the country. He was told that it would be said on behalf of the promoters that they already had competitive examinations, but if that were so, why did they issue the other day a statement to Members of this House to the effect that competitive examinations would be undesirable? Why did they oppose and reject at the last half-yearly meeting of shareholders a resolution for competitive examinations? The Chairman and the General Manager attended a conference summoned a few weeks ago by the Chairman of Ways and Means, and made no such impudent assertion then. On the contrary, they entered into an agreement with the opponents of the measure to establish immediately such examinations, and within forty-eight hours, with scandalous breach of faith, they repudiated the proposals which they had put forward in their own handwriting. The examinations they held were merely qualifying examinations, subject to nomination; and these were in no sense of the term either open or competitive examinations. The promoters had aggravated that breach of faith by circulating a statement to members setting out that this was essentially a matter for the proprietors, and giving figure, by which they alleged that this demand was rejected by the shareholders. He denied that it was a matter only for the shareholders; it was a matter for the Irish people and for this House; and the figures of the alleged division amounted to a scandalous and wilful falsehood and a deliberate attempt to deceive this House. There was no vote whatever on that Motion, for the simple reason that the Chairman arbitrarily, and to his mind illegally, refused a poll, and the poll, as the promoters well knew, was on the question of bringing forward three Bills in Parliament. As for the claim that the directors should be allowed to disqualify any candidate for general unfitness, they resisted it because they knew how that power would be used. The Civil Service did not claim any such veto, and it was quite unnecessary. The competitive examination would test the youth's intellectual fitness, the medical examination would test his physical fitness, and if he was found generally unsuited he could be dismissed. The only other test that could be applied was that of personal beauty, and he objected to setting up the Great Northern directors as beauty specialists. If it were applied to the management of the line, the general manager might escape, but there would, he feared, be a few vacancies on the board; and, personally, although he could sit in that House, he would under a beauty test be ineligible for a Great Northern clerkship. The remedy they proposed was a very simple one. They asked for neither favour, nor preference, nor ascendancy, for they were not going to destroy one ascendancy in order to establish another; but what they did ask for was a fair field and no favour, and let the best man win. The whole Civil Service of the country was based on open competition, and despite all the dangers and terrors of that system, the Empire still survived, and was dragged like King Charles' head into every speech that an Ulster Unionist tried to make. Competitive examinations prevailed in all the other Irish railways, and in the Dublin Corporation; and last year, even under a Conservative Government, the Belfast Corporation, when it came to this House, had to accept the principle. Their proposal would remove many abuses, and would inflict no injustice on any human being. They asked the House not to sanction the continuance of a system that was part of a religious ascendancy—an ascendancy, let him remind hon. Members, which pressed upon Irish Nonconformists almost as severely as it did upon Irish Catholics. If an English railway company, with a board of directors who were all Churchmen, resolutely set themselves to exclude Nonconformists from their service, this House of Commons would give them short shrift; and as this was a Parliament that put in the forefront the doctrine of "no religious tests," he felt sure that it would not hesitate to say that it would no longer tolerate the application of religious tests to clerks of this Irish railway company. He begged to move.

MR. DODD (Tyrone, N.) said he seconded the resolution of the hon. Gentleman with much pleasure. He should have thought that the Great Northern Railway would have been only too glad to have accepted such a resolution. If it was asked why this was pressed upon the Great Northern Railway Company he would say it was because it had got a monopoly from the State. Its lines extended over a very large part of Ireland, and it employed a very large number of men. Therefore they thought it was only right that the Nonconformists and Catholics of Ireland should have an equal chance of obtaining employment in that undertaking. He hoped the Instruction would not be opposed. He recognised gratefully the benefits which the railway had conferred on Ireland in opening up the country, and he was very desirous that this Bill should be read a second time and passed. He considered the Instruction a reasonable one, although of course they recognised that there were some situations which were above competitive examination as well as others which were below it; but inside those two limits a great company like the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland should not object to such a reasonable suggestion as this. It was a legitimate claim to make that vacancies should be filled by the successful candidates in competitive examinations, and he should have thought it would be a great relief to the company itself not to have to exercise patronage of this kind. Perhaps some hon. Member on the other side would relieve the Committee from the obligation to discuss this matter by giving an undertaking that the railway company would accept the Instruction. Of course they must have a proper undertaking, and he would like the hon. Gentleman who gave it also to say that the proxies at the next general meeting of the company would not be used for the purpose of defeating the undertaking given in this House.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That it be an instruction to the Committee on the Bill to insert a clause providing that all future appointments to clerkships of the Great Northern Railway (Ireland) and of the Midland Railway in Ireland shall be made only after and as a result of open competitive examinations; that the examinations shall be conducted by two examiners, whose remuneration shall be fixed by the Committee, one of the examiners to be appointed by the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, or the head of any other educational institution, and the other by the Rector of University College, Stephen's Green, Dublin; that the vacancies shall be filled in the order of merit of the candidates, as reported by the examiners, subject to medical examination; and that due notice of such examinations shall be published in at least four Nationalist and four Unionist daily papers in Ireland. —[Mr. Jeremiah MacVeagh.]

MR. GORDON (Londonderry, S.) said the Instruction which had just been moved was an absolutely unprecedented proposition to place before the House. When any public company came to Parliament for power to carry out a scheme the questions to be considered were those immediately connected with the scheme itself, and if the House of Commons were satisfied that the company applying for such powers had violated some great principle and had not kept within the powers which they already possessed, they had a perfect right to reject any Bill promoted by that particular company. But when a company asked for something which was reasonable, he thought they were entitled at any rate to have the opinion of a Select Committee upon their measure. The case was, however, different with regard to matters which were extraneous and outside the ambition of the Bill itself, and in reference to such matters this House had not been in the habit of entertaining Instructions. They had now before them a Bill which had passed through the other House, and it was a measure which could not be objected to in regard to its principles or the objects and aims which it sought powers to carry out. The Bill was intended to do good service to the people of County Donegal. It would relieve some of the baronies in that county of their guarantees, and would also hand over a certain sum of money to the Treasury. What the company had to do in return was to take over two little lines in Donegal, both of them having baronial guarantees. These lines were making a little profit, and the Government had advanced money to build them, but in return for this the company undertook to pay to the Government a certain amount of money in lieu of those profits. Outside this House it would be regarded as intolerable that the management of the private affairs of a company should be dictated by any outside body. This Instruction proposed to insert into the Bill a clause in regard to matters connected with the railway which did not appertain to the public at all. He wished to point out that this company did not profess to provide all these facilities as philanthropists, but as a money-making concern. The House was now being asked to put a restriction upon the control of the company over its own affairs such as had never been asked for before in Parliament. ["No, no."] Well, he had only heard of one similar instance, and that was in the case of the Belfast Corporation when they were seeking powers to buy the tramways. But what a difference there was between the two cases. The Belfast Corporation were going to use the money of the ratepayers who had no control whatever in the matter, and they were being compelled to submit to the Belfast Corporation borrowing money upon the credit of the rates to work the tramways, and, naturally, they asked for a provision to be put in as to the appointment of clerks. In the present case no person was compelled to take shares in the company, and he did not think that the House ought to put upon the management of a distinctly commercial undertaking such conditions as went beyond anything that had been done before. What was the avowed objection put forward? It was a question of religion. The next time such a measure was brought forward they might have an Instruction moved that the directorate must have upon it a certain number belonging to one Church, and a certain number belonging to another Church, or to some particular Party. When the House was asked to do this kind of thing in the interests of a particular political Party what would be the state of things when another political Party came into power and attempted to reverse the order of things? He, therefore, asked the House to pause before sanctioning the beginning of a process which it was very difficult indeed to see the end of. In this House Parties changed, and it was not long ago that Parties had changed.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Thank God.

MR. GORDON said they might change again before long and then the Nationalist Party would not get everything. If the House was going to allow itself to be carried away from the consideration of important matters by interruptions of that sort when measures necessary for the development of Ireland were brought forward it would be a very great misfortune. It had been stated that certain sums of money had been paid to Roman Catholics. He had inquired into this matter, and the directors informed him that they did not know anything about the matter. [Cries of "Oh" from the NATIONALIST Benches.] It was by interruptions of that kind that hon. Members below the Gangway hoped to carry this measure through. The directors were men whom the people of Ireland knew very well, and they had assured him that they did not know anything about the accusation which had been made and they had no means of knowing. The appointments were made at the present time by examination, and why should they not be allowed to appoint the best men they could get? Did anyone think for a moment that a body of intelligent men working a large concern like this successfully would fail to get the best men they could because some of them belonged to the Roman Catholic Church and others were Protestants? As business men their first aim was to get the best men they could and obtain the best value they could for their money, and that was what was being done by this company. He was inclined to think that if the Chairman of Ways and Means had been present he would have disagreed with what had been stated by the hon. Member who had moved this Instruction. The hon. Member had stated that the representatives of the railway company entered into an agreement to grant this competitive examination; but what actually took place was that the matter was discussed with the only two representatives of the company who were present, and they stated that although they could not bind the company they would bring forward a scheme for competitive examinations. [An IRISH MEMBER: Nothing of the kind.]

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I was present, and nothing of the kind occurred.

MR. GORDON said he was instructed to that effect. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: What is the fee on your brief?] He had inquired, and he had been told, upon authority which he believed, that all that happened was that these gentlemen made that offer but said they could not bind the company. There were only two of them present representing the company, one of them the chairman of the company and the other the manager, and how could those two gentlemen bind the whole board of directors or the shareholders? All they said was that they would put it before the shareholders. ["No, no."] That was at any rate what he was informed actually took place. The directors of the company were perfectly willing and they had themselves put forward a scheme which they were willing to put before a meeting of the shareholders and recommend for their approval. Beyond that they could not go, and he did not think this House ought to ask them to go any further. They were quite willing to give that undertaking. The appointments were made by competitive examination at the present moment. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: They are not.] He thought the directors knew their own business and that was what they had told him. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: Then they have instructed you wrongly.] This was a matter which was more within the knowledge of the board of directors. Was it reasonable to insert an Instruction that certain persons outside this House and outside the company should be the persons to appoint the examiners? The terms which the directors were willing to offer were that they had prepared a scheme dealing with the appointment of clerks which they had resolved to submit at the next half-yearly meeting, and they would use their best endeavours to have it confirmed. When the directors said that, he thought that even the hon. Member for South Tyrone would agree with him that they might be trusted to carry out anything which they undertook to do. Surely that statement was not capable of any double meaning.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE Carnarvon Boroughs): Does that mean that the directors will use their proxies in favour of the scheme?

MR. GORDON: Yes. He was very glad of that interruption, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the directors intended it to be a real compromise. He would now leave the matter entirely in the hands of the House, and he hoped it would be dealt with as a matter of principle. He hoped the abuse which had been indulged in would not operate upon the House or influence them to do something which would be a great injustice to a great commercial undertaking.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said the House would be under some difficulty in dealing with this matter unless they had some authoritative statement on behalf of the railway company. The hon. Member for South Londonderry had spoken with authority, because he had told them that he had spoken from instructions. When the hon. Member rose he entertained the hope that he would have approached this question in an entirely different spirit and that he would have been able to give, not only in the letter, but also in the spirit of his speech some undertaking that they could accept. But the whole spirit of the speech of the hon. and learned Member was a protest against any interference with this company at all. The House of Commons was dealing with a Bill introduced by the company asking for certain powers, and yet the hon. and learned Member spoke of this House as an outside body, and protested against an outside authority interfering in the management of the company. All that they were asking for in this matter was that this company should do what all the other railway companies had already done voluntarily. The hon. and learned Member seemed to be under the delusion that the action of the Nationalist Party in this matter was animated by a desire to have in the employment of this company a certain number of Catholics and a certain number of Protestants. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the object of the railway company was to have the best men possible in the employment. What was asked was that there should be a system of competitive examination which would provide for the engagement of the best men. With reference to the question of the religion of those employed, all he had to say was that it was monstrous for the hon. Gentleman to ask the House of Commons to assume that in the employment of this company there could not be found even one per cent. of men of the religion of the majority of the country fit to carry out the work. [Cries of "No."] Yes; the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech amounted to that. The hon. and learned Gentleman's argument was that the company employed the best men they could get. Not one per cent. of these men were Catholics.

MR. GORDON: My statement was that the directors did not know the religion of the men. They do not know whether these figures are correct or not. I entirely repudiate the idea of the hon. and learned Gentleman that I said that.

MR. J. REDMOND said he could not see that the interruption of the hon. and learned Gentleman affected his argument. If on examination it turned out that not one per cent. of the men were Catholics, it followed, therefore, that in the opinion of the railway company Catholics were not competent for the carrying out of the work. That was a monstrous assumption to make. All that he and his friends were asking in this matter was that this railway company should do what the Great Southern and Western Company and the Dublin, Wicklow and Wexford Company had done voluntarily. What was the objection to this railway company undertaking to do what the other railway companies had done? He had hoped that the hon. and learned Gentlman would be able to give an assurance which would have satisfied his hon. friends, but as he had not done so he hoped the Instruction would be pressed to a division.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) asked the hon. Member for South Down to withdraw the instruction in view of the assurance which had been given. In many parts of Ireland there was far too little railway communication, and it would be a great pity if this House were to-night to cripple railway communication by passing the Instruction on the Paper, which had really nothing to do with the Bill actually before the House. The Chairman of Ways and Means was absent, but if he had been here, he was quite sure the hon. Gentleman would have explained to the House that such an Instruction in connection with a Bill of this sort would not in the ordinary course be a proper one to send to the Committee. He thought the assurance given by his hon. and learned friend should suffice to assure the House that so far as this railway company was concerned there was no desire to do anything which was not perfectly fair and above board. He sincerely hoped the House would treat the matter in a large spirit of tolerance and sympathy. He also hoped that someone on the Front Bench would state the views of the Government on the matter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said he had hoped that the representatives of the railway company would have met some of his Nationalist friends and that they would have seen their way to deal with what he considered to be the grievance made out in respect of the way in which the Great Northern Railway Company had acted. He confessed that after listening to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman he was completely disappointed. He had understood that the directors of the company were prepared to meet hon. Members in a conciliatory spirit, but, instead of doing so, the hon. and learned Gentleman had made and delivered a speech which made it absolutely impossible for his hon. friends from Ireland to accept the assurance given at the end. In an assurance of that character everything depended on the spirit in which it was made. If the hon. and learned Gentleman represented the directors—and he had good reason to think that he did, not merely inside the House, but outside—he must know what was inside their minds, and what were exactly their views on the matter. He had explained their policy in one of the most intolerant speeches he had ever heard in the House. He was not at all surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Waterford was absolutely unable to accept an assurance couched in such language. The facts were perfectly notorious. They were summarised by the hon. Member for South Down in the figures he gave. Of the £21,130 paid in salaries at the Dublin terminus—exclusive of weekly wages to workmen—only £720 was paid to Catholics. Of the £7,862 paid in salaries at the Belfast terminus only £895 was paid to Catholics. The only answer given by the hon. and learned Gentleman to that very grave accusation as to the way in which the railway company dispensed its patronage was that the director did not know the religion of the men. The railway company knew for weeks that this case was to be investigated when they came to this House for additional powers, and the hon. Gentleman opposite knew perfectly that the charge that was made by hon. Gentlemen from Ireland was true in substance and in fact.

CAPTAIN CRAIG said he knew nothing of the kind.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that at any rate the hon. Gentleman had been in full possession of the facts. It was said that this was a very novel proposition, but then they were dealing with very novel circumstances. All that was asked was that the practice which had been initiated by other railway companies should be followed by the Great Northern Company. Under the circumstances he had no option except to support in substance the instruction which the hon. Member for South Down had moved. He proposed, however, to amend the instruction by leaving out the words "after competitive examination" with the view of inserting "held in accordance with such conditions as the Committee may prescribe."

Amendment proposed—

"In line 5, to leave out the words from the first word 'examinations,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'held in accordance with such regulations as the Committee may prescribe.'"—(Mr. Lloyd-George)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) said that the right hon. Gentleman who, he supposed, appeared in his position as President of the Board of Trade, although it was difficult to imagine so, had said that the speech of the hon. Member for South Londonderry was one of the most intolerant he had ever listened to. The right hon. Gentleman was a good judge of intolerant speeches, and he thought he could call to mind many more intolerant speeches than that of his hon. friend which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman. The Instruction which had been moved would compel the Great Northern Railway to change their whole method of appointment of their staff when their undertaking was taken over by the Midland Railway. From what he knew of the matter, many shareholders would think that it was not worth while to take over these two baronial railways at the price which the President of the Board of Trade put upon them.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Your days of bullying are over.

SIR E. CARSON said he did not suppose that the hon. Member who made that interruption, which he heard imperfectly, would suppose that any insolence or abuse would affect him.

MR. KILBRIDE: No; we all know you in the coercion courts.

SIR E. CARSON said it was perfectly plain to anyone who had followed Private Bills dealing with Irish railways this session that those responsible for the undertakings could not expect to get anything like the fair and orderly treatment which railway companies in other parts of the United Kingdom obtained. He thought the promoters of thes Bills ought to remember that, as in the Rathmines case, the question of bigotry would be the sole question which would be considered. Promoters ought to know that whereas in other cases they would have the Chairman of Committtes expressing his views, in the case of an Irish Bill that hon. Gentleman would run away for fear of having to express any opinion at all. The presence of the hon. Gentleman would have been welcome in this particular case because the discussion had turned upon a conference which was said to have taken place in his presence, various accounts of which had been given by those interested in it. The railway company had, through the Members who had spoken, made a very fair proposal. They said they had drawn up a scheme for appointment by competition. They would submit it to their shareholders and do their best to get them to accept it. Anyone would suppose that that was a fair proposal, but the President of the Board of Trade had made a speech as if he were sitting below the Gangway instead of trying to bring about some arrangement which should give satisfaction and have regard to the feelings of the shareholders. The truth of the matter was that the President of the Board of Trade looked at this question in a purely partisan way. He cared nothing about the shareholders and directors, and in the great position to which he had attained—which many of them were glad he had attained to—he thought it consistent with his dignity to show that he was only anxious to gain the cheers of hon. Members below the Gangway. He did not think such conduct was worthy of the right hon. Gentleman in a purely business matter. He believed that if any other railway company had come before the House and said they had formulated a scheme and they thought their shareholders should have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it the House would not have hesitated to say that that was a perfectly fair proposal to make. Of course, however, if the House voted for the Instruction the Great Nothern Company would have the opportunity of considering whether they would proceed further with the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.
